Stern Calls College Audiences 'Best'

By DONNAN BEESON

Playing a 250-year-old violin and rendering both classical and contemporary music, Isaac Stern thrilled a capacity audience Friday night in Schwab at the University Artists' Series.

Stern, equally as pleased with the audience, said after his performance, "A college audience is the best in the world to play to." Suffering from a bad head cold and facing a rigorous weekend schedule, he was nevertheless enthusiastic about the performance. He said that a college audience is "exciting" to play before because the students "listen attentively."

SHORTLY AFTER the program began, Stern stepped forward and announced that he would replace the Bach composition on the program with Brahms' "Sonata in D Minor for Violin and Piano." He added that he hoped not too many people would be disappointed with the change.

In response to a standing ovation, Stern played Bartok's "Four Rumanian Folk Dances." This selection, along with a Stravinsky piece played earlier, was the only modern music performed. For a second encore, Stern played Kreisler's "Shoen-Marin."

"When asked about the response to modern music, Stern said that a younger audience enjoys this type much more than older music lovers.

"YOUNG PEOPLE are more open-minded and receptive, because it is contemporary and therefore closer to them," he added.

The violin Stern played was made in Italy in 1737 and is a Guarnerius Del Gesu. Stern said he bought the violin in 1943. Very few of these violins exist and they are therefore hard to obtain, he added.

Stern, who has played all over the world, was unable to make a sharp comparison of difference among audiences from country to country.

SPEAKING OF Soviet audiences, he said that the Russian people enjoy music a great deal. Students of music attend schools which are only for music, but audiences there are never just students or just adults, he said.

"The same is true there about the reception of modern music," he said, "The young people enjoy it more."
