Environment of Future Office Described by Education Prof

By CARMEN Z. RAPPAPORT

The office worker of tomorrow will have a working environment entirely different from that of today, Dorothy H. Veon, professor of education, said recently. She added that machines would probably take over most of the paper work now done by the office worker.

"OFFICE EDUCATION has a future, but it must be redirected to other lines," Dr. Veon said. "Educators must keep up with the changes brought about by new machines."

Dr. Veon said that she believes that the office worker of the future will need more formal education than the present office worker. She listed several skills that are important for a student to master if he intends to work in an office.

The ability to type well was the first skill that Dr. Veon listed. She said that typing classes should start in the late elementary grades. "Every student who graduates from high school should know how to type," she said.

"STUDENTS SHOULD learn to write and to write well," Dr. Veon said. She added that this skill would help students to think logically and would improve their ability to speak clearly.

Dr. Veon said that it was very important for a student to keep abreast of current news and happenings. The office worker will need to be more informed in the future, she added.

A system of taking notes in shorthand should be mastered by every student, she said, explaining that every student did not need to know the shorthand system that secretaries must master although some short system would be a helpful tool.

"WOMEN ARE barred in very few fields today," Dr. Veon said.

"Women have to be better than the men they compete with in order to hold a job," she added.

Dr. Veon said that women should not ask for special privileges because they are women. She added that women should be feminine.

"Men cannot tolerate business women who are masculine," she said.

"The future is better for an administrative assistant than for a secretary," Dr. Veon said. She also said that women who are interested in a profession in business should try to get into an internship instead of starting as a secretary.

Dr. Veon said that an accounting degree would be an asset for any future-minded woman. She said that there is also room in the public relations field for women.

Machines in an office of the future will be almost entirely different from those of today, Dr.

Veon said. She described a machine that is being tested now that takes dictation and types what it hears. She said that a fault of the machine was that it could not distinguish between two words that sound alike but have different spellings. Dialects confuse the machine, she said.

A COMPUTER will take care of the filing problems of the future, she said.

Before you criticize the old folks, remember that even though a clock is run down, it's right twice a day.
