

Wintry Weather Forecast for Week

By JOEL MYERS

Wintry weather complete with snow and below freezing temperatures is forecast to continue through most of this week.

A trend toward colder weather was predicted to begin last night and continue today. Temperatures are expected to remain below 30 degrees today as contrasted with yesterday's high of 33.

SNOW FLURRIES are possible today and an important snow-storm is likely late today, tonight and tomorrow.

Weathermen have been eyeing the Gulf of Mexico during the past few days because the weather pattern there has been favorable for the development of a major storm.

The odds seem to favor significant storm intensification in the area today.

As the storm moves northeastward along the coast today and tonight, snow, sleet and rain will spread northward.

Temperatures in the central states were expected to be near zero this morning for the third day in succession.

Another and more intense arctic air mass is pushing southward from northern Canada. This fresh intrusion of bitter cold air promises much-below normal temperatures for the eastern half of the nation for the second part of this week and probably into the week-end.

In this area today it should be mostly cloudy and colder with occasional light snow. The high temperature will be about 28 degrees.

TONIGHT SHOULD be cloudy and cold with snow, possibly heavy at times. A low of 20 is expected.

Snow, gusty winds and cold weather are indicated for tomorrow. Temperatures should average in the middle 20's.

Thursday will be mostly cloudy, windy and quite cold.

500 Summer Frosh Expected

About 500 new students will be admitted to the University for the 1963 summer term, Robert G. Bernreuter, dean of admissions and registrar, said yesterday.

Speaking in "relatively modest figures," Bernreuter said that of the 261 applications processed, 152 are qualified for admission. However, Bernreuter stressed that many applications must still be processed before the 500 open spaces are given out.

Bernreuter also mentioned that the students admitted for this summer term will be the last students to enter the University without taking the College Entrance Examination Board Scholastic Aptitude Test. Presently, any Pennsylvania resident who ranks in the upper fifth of his graduating class is exempt from this requirement.

If any open spaces remain in the allotted freshman class after all qualified students are granted summer admission, qualified students who were excluded from the fall term 1963 because of lack of space will be offered summer admission.
