

Group screens director for DUS

The newly formed Division of Undergraduate Studies is on its way to having its first director.

According to Asa Berlin, chairman of the committee screening director applicants, more than 20 applications have been received. Berlin said he hopes to narrow the list to a small slate of candidates by early January.

Although the nine-member committee, composed of students and faculty members, advised that only applications received before Dec. 1 should be considered potential candidates are still welcome.

"We already have several good applicants," Berlin said. "We hope to hire somebody who will help us erase the image of the division as a place for misfits."

The committee is searching for an individual both sensitive to student needs and able to communicate with faculty members and administrators, Berlin added. The candidate should be a proven administrator, hold a doctorate degree and have college level teaching experience.

The candidate also should be an innovator, in light of the innovative nature of the Division itself, Berlin said. The Division takes over many of the duties of the Division of Counseling and Testing, including pre-college testing and counseling, and serving as an academic unit for students not enrolled in one of the University's 10 colleges.

The Division also will advise, register and enroll resident education adjunct students and set up information centers in each college and on each campus.

Senate informs faculty on bargaining

By ROBYN MOSES
Collegian Staff Writer

The University Faculty Senate is doing its share to inform faculty members of the good and bad aspects of collective bargaining.

The Senate has set up several subcommittees to study the implications collective bargaining might bring to the Penn State faculty if unionization occurs.

At the Nov. 29 Senate meeting two subcommittees, one on governance, which investigates the relations of power and authority in the University; and one on working conditions, presented the results of three months of studies in handouts.

The working conditions subcommittee presented tables analyzing contracts containing governance items such as procedure for scheduling classes, and the bargaining unit which was used to negotiate the contract.

The report also contained tables listing governance items according to the institutional level. In comparison with four year colleges and universities, community colleges had the greatest number of governance items in their contracts.

Other tables included in the handout were: academic items by bargaining unit, academic titles by institutional level, working condition benefits by bargaining unit, and working condition benefits by institutional level.

These tables were presented only for discussion and no decisions concerning the adoption of collective bargaining were made.

The governance subcommittee examined unionization effects and whether there are any alternatives to collective bargaining.

The report examined these questions in an historical context. According to the handout, "...most of the concepts and procedures which establish the governance of this University have been the product of individual elements. The intervening years have seen both the Trustees and the Administration formulate their own identity and function more clearly as their interests have dictated."

According to the report, two alternatives seem obvious. The first would be that the University "re-examine itself collectively, with equal voices for all its interests, and produce what it never had, a genuine constitution."

The second would be that "the faculty retain its passive role or organize in its own interests, the same course of action which has been followed by the Trustees and growing administrative policy."

The report contends that, "the trend towards collective bargaining represents one possible mode of accomplishing the latter."
