Increased nuclear safeguards called for

SAN FRANCISCO (UPI) — The United States and other nations must increase their security to prevent political terrorists from stealing nuclear material, an expert on nuclear theft said yesterday.

"A crude, low-yield fission explosive, such as a terrorist group might be capable of constructing, could kill tens of thousands of people and cause hundreds of millions of dollars of property damage in an urban area," said Mason Willrich, professor of law at the University of Virginia and co-author of a Ford Foundation report on the danger of nuclear theft.

Addressing the 15th Annual Conference of United Press International Editors and Publishers, Willrich said a lack of sufficient safeguards would "create substantial risks to the security of nations, the stability of governments and the safety of people in every region of the world."

So far, Willrich told the more than 400 delegates to the Edison conference, the federal government has not given adequate attention to the problem, and money to set up a safeguard system was deleted from the Atomic Energy Commission budget by the Nixon administration.

"Hopefully, the Ford administration will not continue to gamble in this way with the safety of the American people and the security of our governmental institutions from nuclear threats," he said.

Willrich urged the federal government to establish a "nuclear materials security service" to take charge of establishing proper safeguards at installations such as power plants which use nuclear material.

He also urged the United States to work together with other nations to safeguard nuclear material throughout the world.

"The risk of nuclear theft affects us all, since plutonium or high-enriched uranium stolen from the U.S. nuclear power industry could be used in a terrorist attack in some other country, and material stolen in another country could be used by terrorists to hold hostage a city in America," he said.

Willrich was joined in a panel discussion on terrorism by California Attorney General Evelle J. Younger and Dr. David C. Rapoport, professor of political science at the University of California, Los Angeles.

Younger predicted that more terrorist groups like the Symbionese Liberation Army, kidnapers of Patricia Hearst, may surface.

"The infrastructure that spawned the SLA continues to function in and out of the prison system, and in view of the court-imposed restrictions on efforts to control communications between prisoners and outsiders, there is little we can do other than watch these activities until laws are broken," Younger said.

Younger, whose Los Angeles office was the target of a bombing last May, said terrorists may escalate violence in the United States to try to imitate the successes of the SLA and foreign terrorist groups. But he warned against over-reacting to their threat.

"We must recognize that domestic terrorists do not constitute a dangerous cancer which requires radical surgery, but rather a minor infection which is sometimes painful but not by any stretch of the imagination fatal," he said.

Rapoport said the abduction of Patricia Hearst may lead to more political kidnappings in the United States, because it showed that "there are very many prominent potential victims who can't be defended and will be ransomed."

He said until the SLA shootout in Los Angeles in May in which six persons died, American radicals "preached and sometimes practiced terror, but when the police got close, they lost their nerve, pleading frameup or fleeing the country."

"No terrorist movement can ever grow without believing that it has heroes, or that when they have a choice, its members will die for a place in history," Rapoport said. "The SLA shootout could be an enormous significant event. Despite its publicity coups, there was little support for the group among potential sympathizers, until some of its members chose to die."
