Feminist discusses 'job ghetto'

At the University of California at Berkeley, library assistants are paid less than parking attendants. Are parking attendant jobs more demanding?

Feminist Caroline Bird, speaking on campus Friday, said the reason library assistants are paid less is because most are females. If women want to make the same wages as men, they should become parking attendants, Bird said.

Bird, director of the Women's Equity Action League and a member of the Advisory Council of the National Organization of Women, said too many women crowd into a few occupations that are considered appropriate for women.

She said 80 per cent of the female work force holds jobs as stenographers, secretaries, elementary schoolteachers, bookkeepers and domestic workers.

Bird suggested that women be willing to accept men's jobs, such as electricians and engineers, to help relieve the female "job ghetto." Women should be librarians in an industrial corporation, not a school, she said.

Bird, author of three books, said women need self-confidence, not training. "Women should take their talent to where the men are because that's where the money is," she said.

Bird said women, when applying for a job, should ask the employer if they have a maternity program and if a pregnant woman has ever come back from a leave of absence. "This means that the company has rewarding or well-paid jobs," Bird said.

Bird said there are some long-term assets with women holding management jobs. She said she believes management needs a diversity of styles because there are different ways to carry out different jobs. Women management style has been approved by management theoreticians, she said.

Bird said the recession has hurt the women's cause, but that women should be willing to accept any job. One female senator told Bird that being a senator is not a problem but getting elected is.
