Philly police use latest in computerized technology

PHILADELPHIA (AP). — The Philadelphia Police Department has undergone a $1.2 million renovation of its computerized dispatching system, giving it the latest technology in police communications.

The system sorts calls to police in order of importance, automatically locates the patrol car nearest the scene and tells the dispatcher where to send the car — all within a split second.

This can be done because the location of more than 76,000 blocks, 20,000 street intersections and 3,000 miscellaneous sites (such as hospitals and public buildings) have been programmed into the computer, said Chief Inspector James Herron.

The computer-assisted dispatch system (CAD) "will increase the effectiveness of the police department's ability to respond to calls," Herron said at a news conference Tuesday.

When officers and civilians in the police radio room become proficient in the new system, Herron said, they should be able to shave seconds off the time it takes a police officer to respond to a call.

Previously, a police operator jotted down a caller's information on a card, and handed it to a dispatcher. He then selected a patrol car to handle the call and radioed the information to an officer on the street.

Some officers reportedly have complained privately that the computer slows the dispatching of emergency calls.
