Sex balance rule divides state Democrats

HARRISBURG (AP) — Pennsylvania -1s among several states torn over a Democratic National Committee rule Fordering a male-female balance of delegates to the 1980 nominating convention.

The rule was adopted at the 1976 convention as part of an affirmative action program. And the rule, called Tunworkable or even illegal, is causing administrative headaches and night-

"I don't think you can legislate that x number should be female or male. I hink we've reached the point where this quota is causing more havoc than it's worth," said Dorothy Zug, vice chairman of the Democratic State Committee, who's trying to draw up guidelines to comply with the rule.

For example, a woman may be among three candidates for two delegate seats in a particular district. Even though she may get the fewest votes, she would be declared a winner to achieve malefemale balance.

After lengthy and heated debate yesterday, the 219-member state committee was unable to reach a decision on Pennsylvania's guidelines.

ferent sex with fewer votes. "We're destroying the Democratic Party with all this nonsense," said Fred Lebder, a Fayette County Democratic chairman who said the plan ought to be scrapped.

"They have ruined the party. We have to get back to something simple," said Pete Wambach, another committee

The DNC ordered each state to come up with its own plan to achieve malefemale balance. Nine have already asked for an extension of an April 15 deadline. "Our plan is so complicated, I'm not sure the voters or the candidates can understand it. And yet we're complying with all of the rules," said Zug.

"With the rules becoming more stringent each year, you can reach a point where you can go no further and still have any kind of logical delegate selection process. Having written these rules, I think we've reached this point,"

Election Commission audit shows the Pennsylvania GOP Congressional Committee adequately complied with federal campaign laws during the previous two years.

The audit, one of several performed on a random basis by the commission, found only minor errors in disclosure provisions of the 1971 Federal Election Campaign Act and recommended no punitive action.

The audit, from Jan. 1, 1976 to March 31, 1978, included verification of total reported receipts, ex-. penditures, transactions, debts and required supporting documents.

The only inadequacies uncovered, were that the committee failed toitemize 32 separate transfers of $100; and to completely disclose the occupations and business offices of 136 contributors.
