

FTC says number of breweries will drop

WASHINGTON (UPI) — The number of brewing companies in the United States has dropped from 404 in 1946 to fewer than 50 today, and more than half of those are unlikely to survive, a Federal Trade Commission report says.

But, the study concludes, competition remains so fierce among the successful beer makers that there is little likelihood the survivors will wind up with an oligopoly that could affect quality and prices for beer drinkers.

An oligopoly is the concentration of a specific industry in the hands of a few companies cooperating to set prices and standards.

"First, people are talking about the Big Five (Anheuser-Busch, Miller, Schlitz, Pabst and Coors), not the Big Three, and one of these firms, Miller, has expressed the determination to be No.1," it said. "This in itself does not augur well for an era of coordination and cooperation."

"Second, despite all the effort directed toward product differentiation, it is not apparent that consumers of beer display a great deal of brand loyalty. The growth of Miller itself and the record of large changes in market shares in many states are evidence of this," it added.

The study also said there are a number of strong firms outside the top five. It noted that Olympia, having acquired Hamm and Lone Star, "appears to be moving toward national distribution," and Heileman "is expanding westward with the acquisition of Grin Belt and Rainier."

It also said there are several strong regional brewers, including Stroh, Genesee and Schaefer.

"The continued growth of the large companies will increasingly require that they grow at the expense of each other, rather than at the expense of the smaller firms as they did in the past," it said. "In fact this process is already well under way as a result of Miller's rapid expansion."

The report says there were 404 companies operating 471 plants in 1946, compared to 49 operating 94 plants as of 1976, the last year for which figures were compiled.

"There are at least 25 to 30 brewers whose long run chances of survival are probably quite low," the report said.

It said one report found the average capacity of breweries which went out of business was 345,000 barrels per year and "midway through 1976 there were still 21 brewers with capacities less than this."

The report was prepared by the FTC's Bureau of Economics as part of its continuing studies of the structure of various industries. The FTC released the report without comment on it.
