This year's general election has been characterized by very little display of strong emotion and much more apathy on the part of the electorate.

The delegate to the Democratic National Convention on the far left seems to think the whole procedure for selected a presidential candidate is totally boring. Other people, like the owner of the Honda in the bottom left, think nobody should be elected president.

Some voters seem to have found a cause and candidate to support. For example, the John B. Anderson enthusiast, bottom center, is shouting her support for Anderson at a rally in Philadelphia on Wednesday; while a Carter-Mondale delegate has a good time while supporting the re-elect the president coalition at the convention.

However, some people, like those living in second floor Haller Hall, think former President Richard M. Nixon should be given another chance.
