HAVE A GOOD SUMMER

SWE: Helping women engineers adjust

MENNY CLOUSE, Penn State Staff Writer, says you can adjust yourself on the first day of the term, walking into Electrical Engineering 61 and finding that you are the only woman in a class of 80 students. This is not uncommon less than 20 years ago, but it is still the case for some female engineering majors.

Female engineering has long been considered a male-oriented occupation, and it is difficult to alleviate some of the problems associated with being a woman in a predominantly male career. We started out as a group called Beta Delta, which was an engineering society, but the students didn't feel that sorority connotation was really right, so we changed to SWE," said the director of engineering graphics Mary Kummer, adviser of SWE.

engineering and in the profession," Kummer said. However, SWE is open to all engineering students, male or female, and anyone in any science-related field, she said. "More than anything else, we provide moral support so that a person doesn't feel like they're really alone; you can feel very isolated at times," Kummer said.

"SWE encourages women to stay in engineering. Just to walk into a room that has 100 women who are studying the same thing you are studying, instead of walking into a classroom where there's only one or two — it's such a support thing."

"It's true that there are more and more women in engineering all the time, but you may still be in a class that only has one or two (women) and 30 or 40 guys, and that can give you a feeling that maybe you don't belong in that class," she said.

"SWE encourages women to stay in engineering. Just to walk into a room that has 100 women who are studying the same thing you are studying, instead of walking into a classroom where there's only one or two — it's such a support thing."

Some projects sponsored by SWE include guest lectures, plant tours and scholarships, said Nancy Kolb, SWE vice president.

"We try to have a monthly meeting, where we have a professional person from outside in industry, or a person from the school (College of Engineering), come to talk on such things as ethics, career development or the transition from college to career," Kolb said. Kummer said, "We like to have these speakers be role models if possible — recent graduates from Penn State who are now working for somebody, for example."

"The reason that SWE is growing is the fact that there are so many more women studying engineering now. It used to be that only about 1 percent of the enrollment (in the College of Engineering) was women," she said. "It's now approaching 20 percent nationwide."

Membership increased 75 percent in 1980-81 alone, Miller said. Nevertheless, only 150 of the 725 women enrolled in the College of Engineering in the fall of 1980 at University Park joined SWE.

"We need to get our message across that we're here," Kummer said. "I think everybody who's in the group recognizes the fact that it's important and it helps them, but we haven't really gotten the message across to everybody that we're here."

grow, you have to put the time into it. You have to be dedicated," Miller said. "Otherwise, it will stagnate."

Miller, who spent last summer in Washington, D.C. working for the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, became involved with SWE to meet other women in her field, to get a better idea of what the engineering field could offer her and to get involved in a campus organization, she said.

"Through SWE you make contacts," Miller said. "It gives you the opportunity to speak with other women engineers — about entering the job force, problems that they faced, for example. It's a good way to meet people."

The job market for women engineers is fantastic, Kummer said. Women are still in demand — not just because they are women, but because preceding women engineers who have entered the market have proven themselves and have done a good job, she said.

through is potentially a really good employee; they're smart and dedicated — they really want it, otherwise they wouldn't be there," she said.

"This is coming through in the fact that recent employees have done a good job," she said.

Kummer said women are not discriminated against in the engineering field — at least no more than in any other field. "When you get out into an industrial environment, sure, you're going to run into some people who are going to give you a hard time, but not the professionals," she said.

Active involvement on the part of engineering students in SWE will be the determining factor in whether the organization reaches its fullest potential.

The benefits of such an organization are such that engineering students should take full advantage of what SWE has to offer, Kummer said. In this way SWE will expand to reach a broader range of participants, both from industry and from the student body.

"For a woman to be in engineering is still unusual enough that you have to be pretty dedicated as well as smart," Kummer said. "So anybody who makes
