If at first you don't succeed try, try again

OK, so maybe the food in the cafeteria is not as bad as people make it out to be. In fact, there are actually a couple of items that are worth going back for.

Last week, a West Halls student, who shall remain nameless, and a group of his friends were entering Waring Dining Hall when they spotted some chocolate cookies.

When the student inquired about their availability, the cafeteria worker said that the cookies could not be given out until all the blonde brownies and the peanut butter cookies were finished.

After some negotiating and prodding, our hero still could not convince the worker to part with the rare delicacy.

Now it was time for action.

He figured it was time to have the brownies and peanut butter cookies run out. One by one, he and his cohorts went up and took the rest of the brownies and peanut butter cookies in order to savour the flavor of the coveted chocolate cookies.

And when the final total was counted, ed, the group had collected approximately 29 brownies and over 100 peanut butter cookies. Collectively, the trays had well over 50 plates stacked on them.

Of course, they did not throw their spoils away; the victors snuck all 130-odd desserts out of the dining hall undetected and ate them for a solid week.

How many of the hard-earned chocolate cookies did each take?

"About two or three each."

Cops catch Prez with the goodies

With the rise in crime in the country, it is good to see that Police Services is keeping on its toes and trying to make the University a safe place to live.

Last Saturday, West Halls President Mark Mangficio was rolling a keg of root beer into Waring Hall for a well-publicized social.

Thinking the keg was full of your favorite beverage and mine, a campus policeman stopped Mangficio and sarcastically informed him that it wasn't their policy to permit students to throw parties in the residence halls.

Mangficio tried to explain to the officer that the keg was full of root beer, but of course the dutiful police officer knew Mangficio was only trying to talk his way out of the situation.

Not until Mangficio produced the receipt for the keg did the officer realize his mistake.

He quickly sulked into his car and drove away in search of another way to make Happy Valley safe for democracy once again.

Goodbye to Taco Dogs

The end of a tradition. I am heartbroken. One of the only meals that I actually look forward to at the dining halls has come to an end.

The Office of Housing and Food Service Operations has announced it will no longer serve taco dogs.

The well-known and famous dish, which is practically synonymous with dorm life here at the University, has been formally retired.

Just think, there will be many freshmen who will never know the joy of a taco dog. (Taco dogs were last served at lunch during the Cincinnati football game.)

Everyone who looked forward to them should write and complain to William Curley, director of food services, at 7 Foods Building.

While you are at it, today at lunch at 11:30 a.m., there will be a memorial service for the dish. Tap your water glasses to show sorrow over the loss of a near and dear friend, your local "taco dog."
