Black studies panel discussion today

The intersection of black studies and women's studies will be discussed in a panel discussion this afternoon and also at a 7:30 p.m. program, sponsored by the University's black studies program.

Emily Toth, assistant professor of English and American studies, will moderate the panel discussion at 2:30 p.m. in the Paul Robeson Cultural Center.

Panelists include: Audrey Rogers, the coordinator of the women's studies program; James Stewart, director of the black studies program; Sharon Harley, representative of the Afro-American studies program at the University of Maryland; and Barbara Smith, former representative of the women's studies program at the University of Massachusetts.

At the discussion, Rogers and Stewart will also overview the accomplishments and mutual problems of their programs at the University.

Tonight, Harley and Smith will speak on "Black Studies, Women's Studies — The Continuing Challenge: a Dialogue" at 7:30 in the HUB main lounge.

Harley will discuss the historical perspectives of the linkage between black and women's studies, while Smith will speak on the activist tradition in the black studies and women's studies programs. A reception will follow the dialogue at 9:30 tonight in the Paul Robeson Cultural Center.

"We'd like to see lots of students at this program because our programs haven't received the kind of support they need from the student body," Rogers said. "They did get it from the faculty and staff."

Avery Rose, president of Black Caucus, said, "This looks like a good program; it's good to get two groups with similar interests together."

"Women's studies is a good group, they're very open and sensitive to our needs, more so than a lot of other groups," Rose said.
