

Straight up, on the rocks

Some people think the best way to spend a sunny, spring afternoon is jamming their fingers in cracks and crevices and testing their balance on the smallest of rock ledges. It may not sound too appealing, but the stretching and straining are worth it. Nicked knuckles and bruised knees are a small price to pay for the exhilarating feeling one gets from reaching the top of a cliff.

These climbers spent an afternoon exploring the rock formations behind Donaton, a town 30 miles south of State College. Dave Thompson, (14th-electrical engineering, left), looks for a handhold while his partner, Steve, (15th-forestry, right), approaches the support at the top of his climb. The carabiner and webbing are attached to a tree that is sturdy enough to hold his weight should he fall.

The whole set-up can be seen below. Thompson is climbing and the rope runs from his harness through the carabiner at the top and down to the person below. The "belayers" at the bottom holds the rope from slipping if the climber falls.
