Don't tamper with animals, prof warns

make sure students know they will be prosecuted if caught tampering with animals being used for research projects, a professor of poultry science said vesterday.

Kenneth Goodwin said the college plans to put up signs warning potential vandals of prosecution and is considering placing a similar warnng in the student handbook.

George F. McCorkle, agriculture safety officer, said that while all the University's farms and barns are subject to various types of vandalism, the college is most concerned with the theft of chickens from the poultry research farm. Those thefts occur more frequently and are usualy more damaging than other incidents, he said.

The most recent incident was in December when two students were fined more than $200 each for stealing four chickens from the poultry rethe chickens that bothered the department, but that these incidents often ruin important research pro- is no such thing as an unimportant sons said.

The applications so far have come from students in the University Scholars Program, campus ministry organizations and the Lion Ambassadors, among oth-

"No particular group dominates the number of applicants so far, which is what will make this community work because, with diversified representation, there will be more ideas and better communication among students," Lichtig said. Raymond G. Studer, professor of environmental design, said he thinks other interest communities have been successful, but he does not think a privatelyfunded interest community has been tried before. Lichtig said although the townhouses would be rented to anyone if enough application are not received, he hopes it will not become "another rental project." Lichtig said although he could make more money if he would rent the townhouses to anyone, that is not the

"We're putting the money up for the project; now it's up to the students to make it work," Lichtig said. COMMUNITY THIS FALL? We're looking for 135 students who would. like to take part in an experimental OFF CAMPUS student housing program.

Students who are selected for participation must demonstrate a record of involvement in one or more student activities at Penn State. These activities may include involvement with any chartered student organization, academic honors or scholars programs, arts or music, varsity athletics, campus media, or any other appropiate activity.

The student selection committee, will assure that a broad range of these various activities will be represented.

Those students who are selected, will establish their own rules and regulations for this community through its own tenant association.

All community residents will have use of a community center, equipped with three computer terminals with hook ups to the PSU

Various types of programs of interest to the selected tenants will be conducted in the community center throughout the school year.

As one of the participants in this program you will live in a brand new two or three bedroom roomy townhouse with every modern appliance. For a comfortable living experience, at a very reasonable monthly environment you and your friends find exciting

If this sounds like the kind of living
