Campaign '84:

Candidates vie for Susan B. Anthony endorsement

By JILL LAWRENCE Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON — Suffragist Susan B. Anthony proved yesterday, on what would have been her 164th birthday, that she can still stir up a political storm over the women's vote.

"She has become the most popular endorser in the 1984 campaign," said Barbara Hansberry, an aide to DNC political director Ann Lewis. "We're saying, 'Let's get history straight.'"

The drive is sponsored by 65 church, peace, social, professional and political groups ranging from the National Abortion Rights Action League to United Methodist Women.

"Everybody is trying to claim Aunt Susan today... but her heart belongs to only one cause, the cause of women," said her frail grandniece, engaged in a red cape as she stood before a huge birthday cake.

Although the event was billed as non-partisan, the 67-year-old Anthony departed from her prepared text to take a swipe at the administration.

"I don't believe there's any political party that can lay a claim to Susan B. Anthony," added Wilma Goldstein, director of the GOP women's campaign fund. "She was never a person who considered herself a partisan."

However, Democratic women and some Republicans maintain the GOP is trying to do just that and complain that Reagan stands against everything she fought for.

leading Democratic presidential challenger Walter Mondale to help "celebrate the power of the gender gap" at Susan B. Anthony cocktail reception.
Meanwhile, the Democratic National Committee held a college women's vote seminar called "Let's Save Susan B. Anthony's Reputation."

"The name stems from the Republican Party's initiatives to claim her," said Barbara Hansberry, an aide to DNC political director Ann Lewis. "We're saying, 'Let's get history straight.'"

The suffragist's grand-niece, a lecturer and author, was in Washington to launch a non-partisan voter registration drive that aims to register 1.5 million women by the Nov. 6 election.

Balanced budget amendment garnering increased support

By TOM RAUM Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON — Proposals for a constitutional amendment to balance the federal budget have lain dormant in Congress for more than a year, but in the face of deficits soaring toward $200 billion, activity is increasing on the state level to force the national government's hand.

Balanced-budget proponents say they are well within striking distance: 33 state legislatures now have formally petitioned Congress to convene a constitutional convention to draft an amendment to require a balanced U.S. budget except in times of war or other national emergency.

That's just two away from the 34 states required under Article V of the Constitution. Proponents of the measure now are beating the bushes in at least four states — New York, Kentucky, Vermont and California — in hopes of coming up two away from the 34 states required under Article V of the Constitution.

They claim momentum is on their side. "We're only two states away and the impetus is greater now than ever because people are so concerned with high deficits," said David Keating of the National Taxpayer's Union, which has been promoting the balanced budget amendment for nearly a decade.

"We've always thought Congress would not pass a balanced budget resolution without heavy pressure from the states," added Keating. He claimed the decision by the Missouri legislature last May to join the call for the amendment, after it repeatedly rejected such proposals earlier, supplied the "dramatic turnaround" proponents needed to get their effort back on track.

It took more states follow suit, Congress would be bound to call the first such constitutional convention in the nation's history.

The Founding Fathers provided two routes for amending the Constitution. Congress, by two-thirds votes in each chamber, can propose such an amendment, the course that's been followed for each of the current 26 amendments. Or, a constitutional convention can be called for drafting amendments upon the petition of two-thirds of the state legislatures.

Once the amendment has been offered, the process then becomes the same: it must be ratified by three-fourths of the states, or 38 states.

In New York, the state Senate's Judiciary Committee approved a balanced budget resolution last week. It could be up on the floor of the Republican-run Senate there as early as next week, although backers are less hopeful of a victory in the Democratic-run New York General Assembly.

Votes could come within the next few weeks in Kentucky, too, where 22 of the Senate's 38 members are co-sponsoring such legislation. And a similar measure is progressing through the Vermont legislature.

In California, backers are using that state's ballot initiative process to get a statewide referendum on a balanced budget amendment on the ballot in November.

The Reagan administration has been neutral on the subject of a constitutional convention although it has strongly supported a constitutional amendment for a balanced budget. In his 1984 State of the Union address, President Reagan mentioned his support for such an amendment only in passing, despite an unmet 1980 campaign vow that he would balance the budget by 1984.

Balanced-budget proponents point to the inability of even an administration as conservative as Reagan's to get federal spending under control as a prime reason why a restriction on federal borrowing should be written into the constitution.

Efforts have been under way in Congress for some time to approve a balanced budget amendment, but the amendment has never won the approval of both houses.

In 1982, the Republican-run Senate passed such a measure by a 69-31 vote, but it died in the House later in the year, even though it received a 236-187 vote — a solid majority, but still short of the two-thirds margin required. Congressional balanced-budget advocates are promising to step up their activity this year. The Senate Judiciary Committee has scheduled a hearing for March 6 on a balanced budget amendment by Chairman Orrin G. Hatch, R-Nev., which is widely supported by Senate conservatives.
