Lowé can't cure 'Oxford Blues'

By PAULA DUPONT
Collegian Arts Writer

With a title like "Oxford Blues," one would expect a film of at least feigned distinction, since the storyline is set on the historic Oxford University campus. However, the closest relation to English taste or style that the movie delivers is what might appear to be a very predictable West Coast version of Eliza Doolittle on her awkward path to refinement.

"Oxford Blues" is the story of a quest by college student Nick Di Angelo, played by Rob Lowe, to meet and romance the woman of his dreams, Lady Victoria, played by Amanda Pays. He does this by agreeing to pay his friend, a computer whiz, $1,500 to enter his name at the top of the University's waiting list via computer. Di Angelo does not give any consideration as to how he is going to raise the $1,500 until — of course — opportunity knocks almost literally at the door when he meets a rich, divorced woman (Gail Strickland) looking for some action. And, as corry, clichéd stories go, his new-found friend contributes to his cause, and with that money he gambles at the casino and ends up with enough to compensate his friend and pay his tuition.

Self-proclaimed heartrob Rob Lowe as the cocky, gun-chewing Las Vegas casino valet and conning student, portrays Di Angelo as shallow and insincere. At no point in the movie does Di Angelo really display any genuine emotions, not even when his lifelong dream of being with the Lady is consummated. Perhaps the best indication of Di Angelo's attitude is exemplified in the opening scene when Nick and his father are returning from a rowing competition Di Angelo won. His father tells him he could have done better — that he hadn't performed to his potential. Di Angelo's reply was something to the effect, "Why should I knock myself out when I can get by with less effort?"

Di Angelo's outlook seems to be emulated by writer/director Robert Boris' underexertion in maintaining a

Feldman will perform suites at Music Building at Bach's 300th

By JUNE B. BELL
Collegian Arts Writer

How you celebrate J. S. Bach's 300th birthday is up to you, but Leonard Feldman has already made his plans. He'll be performing all six Bach Suites for Solo Cello tonight at 8 in the Music Building Recital Hall.

Feldman, an associate professor of music at the University, was inspired by the Olympics to perform all the suites in one concert. "It's the closest I'll ever get to running a marathon," he said. "It's more difficult than a marathon, though, because the suites increase in difficulty. It's like running twenty miles, the last six uphill!"

Two intermissions and refreshments will break up the concert, which should last close to three hours, Feldman said.

The Solo Suites were written in 1721 and are rarely performed all in one evening because of the technical dexterity required by the performer and the long span of attention needed by the audience. Feldman said the six suites are usually performed in two concerts a week apart. He's not the first person to perform all the suites in one concert, but Feldman said he knows of only three in his lifetime who have done the same.

A member of the Alard Quartet since 1959, Feldman started playing the cello when he was seven and began studying the suites two years later. Having played and taught them constantly over the years, a concert performance is nothing sudden, he said.

Feldman isn't worried about audience attendance. His first concern is that he plays well and is in the proper
