

Kellogg funds new look at food LCB renewal with less power urged

By GREGG BORTZ

Students will be able to learn about agriculture through a new educational program examining agriculture from a humanistic rather than technological viewpoint, the program director said.

"The average citizen is not informed about agriculture and cannot make good decisions concerning agricultural problems," Dorothy Blair said. "The program can handle the problems facing the agriculture program and at the same time direct attention at humanities issues."

Blair said the food, agriculture and society program was established by the College of Agriculture in conjunction with the colleges of Liberal Arts and Human Development and the science, technology and society program. It will be funded by a $100,355 grant awarded by the W.K. Kellogg Foundation of Battle Creek, Mich. The grant will sponsor a two-year program consisting of five new courses to be offered in Spring and Fall 1986. Blair said the new courses are for both major and non-major students interested in agriculture and will become permanent course offerings at the University.

Most of the grant money will go toward developing the new courses, three offered by the College of Agriculture in conjunction with another college and two offered through the College of Agriculture at the University's Circleville Farm near campus.

Instructors will cover history, technology and culture, the political economy of agriculture, agricultural systems in an ecological context and various food production courses. Gene Love, associate dean for the College of Agriculture, said the new courses deal with major issues every American should be concerned about. "We would like for all (agriculture) students to take the courses," he said, "but to link the information is valuable to all students."

The grant will also be used to develop "interdisciplinary faculty working groups," which will produce research and policy suggestions on specific agricultural problems and issues, Blair said. Blair said the University is one of about 24 institutions that received a Kellogg grant this year. She said although other colleges have this type of program, "the University program is unique in that it was actually generated from the College of Agriculture, while at most colleges the school of liberal arts generates the program."

The state Senate Law and Justice Committee has recommended that the Pennsylvania Liquor Control Board retain control of state liquor stores but relinquish its law enforcement power to the state attorney general's office, the committee chairman said yesterday.

State Sen. John J. Shuman, R-Dauphin, said the committee has recommended the LCB keep its licensing functions and liquor-selling operations. The LCB would then be more responsive to public needs and provide better wholesale purchases and service, he said.

The LCB is set to be eliminated at the end of the year unless the legislature takes steps to re-establish it. The proposal calls for the re-establishment of the LCB for four years, but without its liquor enforcement power. After that period, legislators could determine if the LCB can operate as a viable operation, Shuman said.

ment, public corruption and organized crime in the state, Shuman said. Therefore it is logical to transfer the liquor enforcement power to an office that deals regularly with enforcement, he said.

State Rep. Lynn Herman, R-Centre, said he favors the proposal to eliminate the LCB's enforcement power. If this were done, Herman said, the LCB could concentrate on improving liquor selection and convenience.

Herman said his main concern is not whether liquor stores are state-owned or privately-owned. He said he would like the stores to control liquor sales to minors and improve pricing, selection and convenience.

If state-controlled liquor stores are eliminated, the state would have no control over the type of stores that could sell alcoholic beverages, said state Sen. J. Doyle Corman, R-Centre. As a result, many supermarkets and convenience stores could sell wine and eventually beer, he said.

'Hand-in-hand' to join students, handicapped

Mentally handicapped children and adults will have a chance to experience a day of fun and companionship as part of the third annual Hand-in-Hand Festival.

The event, sponsored by the University's Recreation and Parks Society, will bring about 450 mentally retarded Central Pennsylvania citizens of all ages to the University for a day of fun activities. Each special guest will also share the experience with a student volunteer.

The festival will be held Sept. 28 from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. at the Intramural Building fields. Mark Chilcott, community relations committee member and Recreation and Parks Society director, said the Hand-in-Hand festival has three goals: to provide a memorable day for a mentally retarded individual; to increase public awareness of the needs and abilities of the mentally retarded; and to provide a unique learning experience for all guests, volunteers and organizations involved.

Neal Manning, president of the University's Circle K, said he participated last year as a volunteer and plans to take part in the festival again this year. "I think everyone should get involved," Manning said. Anyone interested in volunteering can contact the Recreation and Parks Society at 865-1851.

The Hand-in-Hand organization has its origin at St. Joseph's University in Philadelphia, Chilcott said. Other colleges in Pennsylvania and New Jersey have held similar festivals that have been very successful, he said.

Several entertainers will perform including University jugglers, guitarist Randy Hughes, the Playful Family and entertainer Bruce Cleveland. There will also be clowns and mimes, a petting zoo and marionettes.
