PSU survey shows more AIDS information needed

The University needs more ways to educate students about AIDS, according to a recent survey conducted by a University human development class.

Lori Freer (senior-individual and family studies), a survey group member, said the study showed few people were likely to attend an Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome educational program, and the University should dispense information to students in other ways.

Ninety percent of the survey respondents said they were unlikely to attend an AIDS educational program while 9 percent were very likely to attend, said Anne Barnhart (senior-individual and family studies).

Stacy Natis (senior-individual and family studies) said the study showed women are more concerned about AIDS and more interested in attending an AIDS program.

The survey was conducted as part of an Individual and Family Studies 491 class project. The survey of 244 undergraduates included six gay or bisexual men, Natis said.

Anthony D'Augelli, associate professor of human development and IFS 491 instructor, said the survey was intended to give University administrators information needed to help form effective educational programs.

"We're at the point where the University must make a decision about AIDS," D'Augelli said.

The fear of AIDS is a much greater concern than the possibility of someone developing the disease, he said.

The study showed what University students know, do not know and want to know, D'Augelli said, adding that the information collected will help educators focus educational programs to dispel fears.

The survey found that 56 percent of those surveyed said they knew something about AIDS, but needed more information.

Men who took the survey thought they knew basic AIDS facts, but incorrect answers to AIDS questions showed many misconceptions, Barnhart said. Women surveyed more readily admitted they did not know the information.

Freer said the survey group suggested inserting into tuition bills forms explaining where to get more information about AIDS so students can get the information confidentially without fear of negative stereotypes, Freer said.

The survey group also suggested the University provide AIDS counseling and literature, and set up an AIDS hotline.

Barnhart said the survey also found 1 percent of those surveyed are very worried about contracting AIDS while 21 percent are not worried at all.

She said the greatest worries of the participants were that AIDS will become an uncontrolled epidemic, they will acquire AIDS through a blood transfusion, and no cure will be found.

Natis said the survey was distributed in various places to assure a random sampling. These places include the HUB, residence halls, a fraternity, a physical education class, a bus stop, and a gay bar.

AIDS education needed to calm public's fears, Pitt epidemiologist says

The public must be educated about AIDS to halt the hysteria that surrounds victims who attend public schools, said Lawrence Kingsley, an epidemiologist with the University of Pittsburgh's department of medicine.

"Education is the major difficulty we're having because we're dealing with a hysterical issue," Kingsley said.

He said people must understand AIDS is a sexually transmitted disease and is not transmitted through casual contact.

"The message is AIDS is not easily communicable," he said.

Kingsley recommended the public be educated about AIDS before policy decisions are made, adding that a policy will not work unless it is created in understandable terms, he said.

"I think the question is what we can do now, and this is a job for public education," Kingsley said.

Counseling and information programs should be started by public officials and school teachers, Kingsley said.

William Asbury, University executive assistant to the president, said the University hopes to expand its educational programs to include the whole community so to AIDS victims would not have to suffer living in a hostile atmosphere.

"We would hope the environment would be acceptable," Asbury said.

Asbury said the University intends to recommend each AIDS case be treated on an individual basis. If an AIDS victim could attend classes and continue normal activities, he or she would be allowed to remain at the University, Asbury said.

"They would not be excluded or banned from the University," he said, adding that the University would also not deny admissions to an AIDS victim.

It would be up to victims and their physicians to decide when or if they should withdraw from the University, Asbury said.

Kingsley said he agreed that every case should be dealt with separately and an individual should not be excluded simply because of an HTLV-III infection.

Asbury said the University plans to treat employees with AIDS as if the employee had any other type of debilitating disease. Employees will be allowed to perform their jobs as long as they can meet job requirements.

The University will not publicly identify students or faculty members who have AIDS, Asbury said, adding that University administrators must work to develop an ethical code for dealing with AIDS cases.

However, Asbury said if rumors and insinuations begin, the University will deal with the situation according to existing policy.

"Our biggest problem is rumors and dealing with those rumors," Asbury said.
