

The big race:

Top Democrats jockeying early for 1988 presidential election

By DONALD M. ROTHBERG
AP Political Writer

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Gary Hart is stocking up on beef. Joe Biden is grilling a Cabinet member one week. A Supreme Court justice the next. Mario Cuomo has been preoccupied with who will be lieutenant governor of New York and Lee Iacocca is saying, no, no, no. And they are only a few of the names in a crowded Democratic field relishing the prospect of the first presidential election of the post-Reagan era.

Campaigning for the 1988 elections is just heating up, but the jockeying for the 1988 Democratic presidential nomination already is going full steam. No one has declared his candidacy, but there is plenty of early activity.

So far, the Democrats have avoided the sort of bloodshed that usually marks the struggles for the party's presidential nomination and often leaves the winner badly wounded.

But what places them most in the prospect of running against someone other than Ronald Reagan.

The Democrats never laid a glove on Reagan. They carried six states in 1980 and one in 1984.

While the prospect of Reagan's retirement is a source of Democratic delight, many party leaders are aware that their decline in presidential politics began well before 1980.

The Democrats have lost four of the last five presidential elections and their nominees have been particularly weak in the South and West, the high-growth Sunbelt states.

As a result, the potential Democratic candidates are busy establishing their credentials as spokesmen for the party's future rather than prisoners of its past.

Finding himself in the unfamiliar role of early front-runner, Hart is working hard to assure that no opponent can score points during the next campaign by repeating Walter F. Mondale's question from 1984: "Where's the beef?"

The Colorado senator, who is giving up his seat when his term expires in January, has written a book on defense policy, delivered a lecture series on foreign affairs, and issued a steady stream of statements on a broad range of issues.

Hart said in an interview that he welcomes the attention his ideas get because of his role as front-runner.

"If I'm right about my notion that ideas have power, and it's not just personalities, then I welcome the attention to those ideas," he said.

Linked to one of the ideas getting a lot of attention is Rep. Richard Gephardt, D-Mo., who may try to make the tough jump from the House of Representatives to the White House.

The prospect of a Southern regional primary on March 8, 1988, is particularly attractive to party conservatives who have spent the past year making that dream a reality.

But it also has its appeal to the Rev. Jesse Jackson, who stands alone on the left wing of the party and appears virtually certain to make another run for the presidency.

Opponents of the regional primary have argued that in a crowded field, Jackson could end up the winner in Southern states with sizable black electorates.

Jackson surprised many party leaders with the strength of his 1984 campaign and this time he is far better organized. Jackson is using his Rainbow Coalition to build a grass roots organization.

Cuomo is running for a second term as governor of New York and recently has been preoccupied with trying to assure that his choice for lieutenant governor, Rep. Stanley Lundine, becomes the Democratic nominee for that post.

As a senior member of two important Senate committees — Foreign Relations where he had a heated confrontation with Secretary of State George Shultz over South African policy, and Judiciary where he questioned Justice William Rehnquist at the hearing on his nomination to be chief justice.
