Weinberger doubts threat from Iran

By TIM AHERN
Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger said yesterday that he doesn't think Iran will attack U.S. Navy ships in the Persian Gulf, despite the continuing threats voiced by the Islamic revolutionary nation.

Weinberger's prediction came hours after Tehran Radio broadcast a new threat warning that Iran might attack American nuclear reactors.

Weinberger told the House Foreign Affairs Committee that "in the past, Iran has astoundingly avoided even the mere hint of a threat toward U.S. ships, either combatant or commercial."

"We do not expect that situation to change, Iran's violent rhetoric notwithstanding," he said. "We believe they will not launch any attacks on American ships."

Weinberger's prediction came as he and Adm. William Crowe Jr., chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, spent a second day on Capitol Hill discussing U.S. policy in the Gulf region, a major source of oil for the West.

President Reagan has promised to provide U.S. flag protection to Kuwaiti tankers, raising congressional fears that the United States might be drawn into the Iran-Iraq war, Kuwait is an ally of Iraq.

The fears have been heightened by the May 17 missile attack on the frigate USS Stark by an Iraqi warplane that killed 37 sailors. Weinberger and Crowe both said yesterday that they accept Iraqi explanations that the attack was a mistake.

Administration sources said Tuesday that the Navy's Middle East Task Force in the Gulf will temporarily swell in size to as many as a dozen warships by early July and then drop to a standing force of eight or nine to provide escorts for the Kuwaiti tankers.

The Navy has selected three ships currently deployed in the Pacific for duty in the Gulf in addition to three other combat vessels that left the East Coast for the region last weekend, said the sources, speaking on condition of anonymity.

The aircraft carrier Constellation, meantime, will move into a patrol position outside the Gulf during the first week of July.

Weinberger and Crowe refused to say publicly what the United States might do if Iran does strike U.S. ships, whether the vessels are Navy craft or the reflagged Kuwaiti tankers. U.S. officials have said they would treat an attack on a reflagged Kuwaiti tanker the same way they would an attack on an American-owned ship.

Both Iran and Iraq have been attacking tankers for the past three years, although 70 percent of those strikes came from Iraq, Weinberger noted.

He challenged what he said is a public perception that the Gulf is a free-fire zone. "On any given day there are approximately 400 ships in the Persian Gulf and since 1984 less than 1 percent have been attacked," he said.

The Stark attack shows that "danger is always near," Weinberger continued. "But it should not be allowed to distort appearances beyond reality. The actual threat to U.S. shipping in the Persian Gulf has not changed since March when we briefed members of the Congress on our reflagging initiative with Kuwait."

Crowe voiced similar sentiments, testifying that "the Gulf today is an uncertain place and can be dangerous, but it is not a war zone in the accepted use of the words."

Since American military forces have been more alert in the wake of the Stark attack, he said, "we have not as yet seen any change in Iranian conduct at sea — in fact, they appear to be even more cautious than previously."

"While this situation could change quickly, I would suggest that we base our judgments and actions on tangible evidence rather than conjecture," Crowe said.

In a floor speech yesterday, Senate Republican Leader Bob Dole of Kansas criticized American allies for providing "good rhetoric" instead of strong material support for U.S. moves in the Persian Gulf.

Dole said the position taken Tuesday at the summit of seven industrialized nations in Venice, Italy, left most of the responsibility for protecting the vital oil route up to the United States.

Reagan, who did not seek military help, has pronounced himself "delighted" with the summit position on the Gulf, which called for unspecified "just and effective measures" to guarantee safe passage of ships and a cease-fire in the Iran-Iraq war.

Weinberger, in his testimony yesterday, said it is up to the United States to protect the Gulf.

First lady flies to Venice after Swedish appearance

By EDITH M. LEDERER
Associated Press Writer

VENICE, Italy — Nancy Reagan, chosen by a poll of American men as the woman they'd most like to spend an evening with, joked today that her anti-drug visit to Sweden might be her last alone because the president was worried about competition.

Speaking to reporters on the flight from Stockholm to Venice, the first lady said she was flattered by the Gallup poll results but that her first choice for a wonderful evening was still "Ronald Reagan."

"I talked to my husband last night and he said, 'I'm sitting here with a poll in my hand ... and I think you better get over here soon,'" she said, laughing.

The first lady said she was flattered by the Gallup poll results but that her first choice for a wonderful evening was still "Ronald Reagan."

When asked for her reaction to another Gallup poll in Europe, in which 56 percent of respondents said Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev was the man they'd most like to spend an evening with, Nancy Reagan said: "well I don't believe that. I her last alone because the president was worried about competition."

The Gallup survey on the woman that men would most like to spend an evening with was commissioned by Faet Lane magazine. Others placing high were actresses Heather Locklear, Raquel Welch and Lynda Carter.

The first lady left Stockholm today to rejoin the president in Venice after a two-day anti-drug campaign marred by anti-American protests, she said. The first lady's U.S. Embassy personnel before leaving that her trip had been "a learning experience. I'll take a lot of things back to the United States with me."

Lame shuttle used in tests

By HARRY F. ROSENTHAL
Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Enterprise, a space shuttle that can't go into space and has never shuddered, is suffering new indignities as the public's eye is turned to a shuttle with hundreds of nylon straps, like a Gulliver restrained by Lilliputians.

Its purpose is to help test a "Shuttle Orbiter Arresting System," which is a giant net that the National Aeronautics and Space Administration hopes to put at remote emergency landing sites like Dakar, Senegal, or Zaragoza and Moron, Spain.

The idea is that if the shuttle has landed at one of those places, which have relatively short runways, the system can be erected to halt the shuttle, which is notorious for having bad brakes.

Engineers have been at Washington Dulles International Airport in suburban Virginia all week to test the net. It conjures up an image of the 130-ton space plane hurtling down a runway into the contraption, for a net designed to stop it if it's going about half that speed.

The Enterprise was pulled through, a few inches at a time, to see how the elaborate net drapes over it. "We wouldn't want to catch the nosewheel on the net and break it," said Dick Melone, an loan to NASA from the Naval Air Engineering Center at Lakehurst, N.J., suffering new indignities as the public's eye is turned to a shuttle with hundreds of nylon straps, like a Gulliver restrained by Lilliputians.

Reporters were invited out to see the shuttle, but not the actual testing. The Navy was brought in because it knows something about snagging planes when they land on a carrier deck. The system designed for the shuttle is similar, only bigger.

The system, designed by All American Engineering Company of Newark, Del., consists of a nylon net assembly suspended 25 feet above the runway surface with supports on either side. When it's put in place there will be "energy absorbers" on each side to provide the braking force for the orbiter.

The shuttle normally lands at about 200 mph; the net is designed to stop it if it's going about half that speed.

Reagan officials oppose stricter notification rules

By LARRY MARGASAK
Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Reagan administration yesterday tried to head off stricter congressional notification requirements for covert operations.

The State Department and Central Intelligence Agency witnesses told a House panel the Democratic-sponsored legislation was an overreaction to President Reagan's failure to notify Congress of secret U.S. arms sales to Iran.

Both administration witnesses emphasized changes Reagan made after the Iran-Contra affair became public, especially a prohibition against the National Security Council staff undertaking covert actions.

The arms sales to Iran, diversion of some profits to the Nicaraguan Contras and sale of weapons to the rebels when Congress had banned official U.S. aid were directed from the NSC. Current law provides that in general, the president should notify the congressional intelligence committees before undertaking a covert operation he has authorized. There are two exceptions.

First, in extraordinary circumstances, the president may limit prior notice to a leadership group of eight members of the House and Senate.

Second, in certain undefined cases, the chief executive may skip prior notice, but must provide the intelligence panels notice in a "timely fashion" along with an explanation of the delay.

Clash follows pope's speech

KRAKOW, Poland — Police fired tear gas to disperse thousands of anti-government protesters chanting "Solidarity will win!" yesterday after Pope John Paul II spoke out forcefully in favor of the outlawed labor union.

The pope, who has called for calm and restraint during his third pilgrimage to his homeland, also announced that Moscow had barred him from visiting the Soviet republic of Lithuania this year.

Officials said some demonstrators threw stones and smoke bombs and a policeman was seriously injured. Several youths were detained.

"We want Lech, not Wojciech," chanted about 3,000 people, referring to Lech Walesa, the Solidarity leader who became pope. "But I don't know what to tell you today."

He told the crowd to have "solidarity" with each other, but clearly was using the word in its general sense.

In his address at the Krakow Field First, in extraordinary circumstances, the president may limit prior notice to a leadership group of eight members of the House and Senate.

Witnesses said they saw police using their clubs to beat back the demonstrators but that they did not see any beatings. They also said the police shot tear gas and smoke bombs from pistols and set off shock bombs that created deafening noises without injuring anyone. Earlier, in the southeastern city of Farnow, John Paul II spoke out forcefully in favor of the outlawed labor union.

Rabies bill fine-tuned

HARRISBURG (AP) — A House-Senate conference committee yesterday fine-tuned legislation for imposing penalties on residents who fail to have their dogs and cats inoculated against rabies.

The committee over a two-week period made several significant revisions to the bill, including adding a provision providing veterinarians with immunity from civil actions that might stem from their participation in rabies-shot clinics.

Rep. Russell Letterman, the Centre County Democrat who chaired the committee, said the immunity provision would encourage more veterinarians to participate in low-cost clinics.

Group lobbies for min. wage hike

WASHINGTON (AP) — Several dozen low-wage and unemployed Philadelphians lobbied federal lawmakers yesterday in favor of a proposal to raise the minimum wage.

One of the jobless members of the so-called Philadelphia Unemployment Project dressed like Abraham Lincoln to call attention to "slave jobs." The group met with Rep. Thomas Foglietta, D-Pa., and other lawmakers.

Code violations found at restaurant

PHILADELPHIA (AP) — City officials have found eight fire-code violations and 20 electrical violations at a restaurant where a diner received an electrical shock, but do not know if any of the violations contributed to the man's death.

Henry G. Herling, city commissioner of Licenses and Inspection, said Tuesday the 304-year Old Valley Green Inn in Fairmount Park was ordered to remain closed until all violations are corrected.

The electrical code violations include the use of extension cords for appliances. Last Saturday, William M. Slunder, 66, of Flourtown received an electrical shock after apparently unplugging an air conditioner at the restaurant. He died about 30 minutes later at Chestnut Hill Hospital.

AIDS booklets urge abstinence

WASHINGTON (AP) — A pair of booklets, unveiled yesterday, for use by elementary and high schools to teach about AIDS rely on telling students to abstain from sex and drugs and refer only to passing to homosexuality and condoms.

The booklets' authors, Linda Meeks and Philip Heit, said decisions on what kinds of information to include were influenced by what some school districts said would be unacceptable.

"There are certain school systems that just will not introduce certain terms," Heit said at a news conference.

The booklets, "AIDS — What You Should Know" and "AIDS — Understanding and Preventing AIDS," are intended for use by students in grades five through eight and by high school students, respectively.

Pupils mastering written language

WASHINGTON (AP) — American school children may have trouble putting their ideas down on paper in a thoughtful manner, but they are mastering the mechanics of grammar, punctuation and spelling, a testing agency said yesterday.

The federally sponsored National Assessment of Educational Progress said its findings should be comforting for everyone "concerned about how well the nation's students are learning to control the conventions of written language."

The agency's brief report, "Grammar, Punctuation, and Spelling," is third study drawn from a 1984 test of the writing abilities of 6,000 students ages 9, 13 and 17.

Weather satellites out of service

WASHINGTON (AP) — The nation's prime weather satellites were out of service for several hours after lightning strikes disabled their ground receiving stations Tuesday night, the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration reports.

At least three lightning bolts hit the agency's satellite station at Wallops, Va., overwhelming defensive measures including lightning rods, surge suppressors and a grounding system, the agency said.

Damage was extensive, officials said, and NOAA personnel worked most of the night restoring service. The station was unable to obtain weather images from GOES-West, the stationary satellite watching the western half of the nation, from 7:15 p.m. EDT Tuesday until 4:15 a.m., Wednesday, the agency said. GOES-East images were blanked out from 7:30 p.m. until 1 a.m.

Possible red tide in Delaware

DOVER, Del. (AP) — Delaware health and environmental officials are trying to determine whether a red tide has hit the Indian River Bay.

An extensive fish kill was discovered near the Rosedale Beach area Monday morning, and state officials said they were looking for microorganisms in the bay that have been connected elsewhere to red tides.

A deadly red tide occurs when concentrations of a particular microorganism become so heavy that the waters appear stained red or brown, and toxins released by the organisms reach deadly levels. A red tide never has been reported in Delaware.

Missing former impresario found

LONDON (AP) — Sir Rudolf Bing, 68-year-old former head of New York's Metropolitan Opera, was found wandering the streets of east London early yesterday after disappearing from his hotel for the second time in two weeks.

"He was apparently none the wiser for wear," said a spokesman for Scotland Yard, the London police headquarters. "He was asked who he was, and then taken back to his hotel."

Bing was discovered in London's Hackney district 16 hours after he left his modest hotel near King's Cross train station to buy cigarettes. He had wandered 2 1/2 miles away.

Bing disappeared from the same hotel on May 28 in the same circumstances. Ten hours later, he was found unharmed wandering along a street in Chelsea more than 3 miles away.

"I must be more careful never to leave him without checking that he has got cigarettes," Bing's 47-year-old wife, Carroll, said yesterday.

E. Germany spurns diplomatic protest

BERLIN (AP) — West Germany today renewed its diplomatic protest over the mistreatment of Western reporters by East German police during demonstrations by rock music fans near the Berlin Wall, officials said.
