Stars narrate Constitution 'shorts'

By BOB DVORCHAK
Associated Press Writer

Barbara Walters talks about the men who signed the U.S. Constitution. Celeste Holm discusses women's suffrage. Dick Cavett highlights colonial travel. George Plimpton recalls the "four-month miracle."

They and other celebrities narrate a series of 26 one-minute television vignettes called "Constitution Minutes" made for the 200th anniversary of the writing of the framework of American democracy.

"Too much of the information coming out about the Constitution is starchy and pompous. I wanted to generalize it so everybody could learn," said Lou Reda of Easton, Pa., executive producer of the series.

"I'm interested in informing the brown baggers of this country that the Constitution is all about. The people I like to reach are the people who watch 'Laverne and Shirley,'" said Reda.

Reda, the executive producer of the CBS miniseries "The Blue and

The Gray," has sold the vignettes to WWOR in New York and KGO General stations KHJ in Los Angeles and WLIB in Memphis, Tenn. Public broadcasting stations in 157 cities are also airing the "Constitution Minutes."

The vignettes are playing at two visitor centers in Philadelphia, where delegates from the original colonies met 200 years ago to write the 4,546-word document that united a struggling infant nation.

Reda also plans to sell the soundtracks to radio stations. "The way we produced them, it doesn't make any difference if you watch them or listen to them. The message is there," Reda said.

At WWOR, the vignettes are used as part of the noon newscast during the bicentennial celebration. "They convey in layman's terms the different parts and important footnotes to the Constitution. The more information we can supply to our viewers the better we are and the better informed our viewers are," said Farrell Meisel, director of programming at WWOR, which reaches 20 million households.

"In an uncomplicated way, these one-minute vignettes will give everyone some insight into what our nation stands for," said Pat Servodio, president of KGO General.

"This is one of the strongest ways to use television. This will give greater reach and cover a variety of topics," Servodio said.

"There's a need to educate without doing it in a boring fashion," Richard Morris, professor emeritus at Columbia University, was a consultant to the series and narrated one of the minutes. He was also a consultant to CBS on the "Bicentennial Minutes," a series that aired in 1976 during the nation's 200th birthday celebration.

Lynn Redgrave even manages to get a mention of sex into her minute. Philadelphia Newspapers Inc., publisher of The Philadelphia Inquirer and the Philadelphia Daily News, is underwriting the vignettes on WHY?, the local public television station.

PNI had sponsored a series on the First Amendment, and the "Constitution Minutes" helped explain the document in human terms, according to William White, director of public relations at WHY?

"It seemed to convey so much good information about the Constitution, we wanted to promote it," said White, who recommended the series to editors at other Knight-Ridder newspapers.

Plimpton: "During four months of searing heat, 55 men produced a four-page document that was a dazzling model of political theory and practice. Among its revolutionary innovations were three co-equal branches — the Congress to make the laws, the president to implement them and the Supreme Court to interpret them."
