Pitt-Penn State battle for blood continues

By GERRIT VAN BURK
Collegian Staff Writer

The clash between Penn State and the University of Pittsburgh on Nov. 14 may be a bloody one; or at least the Red Cross hopes blood will come from it.

For the past four years, a rivalry between Penn State and Pitt has existed, not only in athletics but also in blood, said Red Cross Campus Coordinator Connie Schroeder. Today marks the beginning of the fifth annual Pitt-Penn State blood drive.

Schroeder said in the past, the Lions have done a great job collecting blood, but this year the competition could be tough. Pitt beat the University in 1983, the first year of the rivalry, but the Lions have responded to the pressure winning the past three years, she said.

"Penn State has beaten Pitt by very narrow margins the last few years," Schroeder said.

The rivalry was started as a way to put a safe supply of blood on hospital shelves across the state during the last six weeks of the year. Schroeder said this is a time when accidents increase and blood donations are usually low.

The drive is co-sponsored by the Association of Residence Hall Students, the Interfraternity Council, the Panhellenic Council, Alpha Phi Omega, and Gamma Sigma Sigma.

Blood will be collected around campus throughout the week at the following locations from 1 to 7 p.m.

• Today — Atherton and Warnock Union.

• Tomorrow — Waring Hall.

• Wednesday — Simmons Hall.

• Thursday — Findlay Union.

Blood will also be collected in Pollock Union from 1 to 7 p.m. next Monday and from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. next Tuesday and Wednesday in the HUB.

In addition to the blood collection on campus, the Red Cross Center, at 121½ E. Beaver, will take blood donations Nov. 10.

The winner of the competition will be announced at the Penn State-Pitt football game.

According to a pamphlet distributed by Red Cross, anyone can give blood as long as they are in reasonably good health, are between the ages of 17 and 69 and weigh more than 110 pounds.

It takes one hour to donate blood, during which the donor receives refreshments to help replenish the lost blood. The donor's blood is tested for iron, and the donor's blood pressure and body temperature are taken.

Blood is shipped to Johnstown, where it is tested for, among other things, Hepatitis B virus, syphilis and AIDS, Schroeder said.

The blood that a person donates can be used in many different ways, and in some cases, a pint of blood can help up to four people after the blood is broken up into its components.

"There is a 96 percent chance that a person will need blood sometime in their life," said Schroeder.

Many people are afraid to donate blood these days, she said. It is impossible to contract AIDS by the donation of blood because all of the equipment used by the Red Cross is sterile and the needles and other collection instruments are used once and discarded, Schroeder said.
