Real-life victim sues 'Philadelphia' creators

NEW YORK — Relatives of a lawyer who was fired after contracting AIDS will try to prove to a jury this week that his story was stolen by the creators of the movie Philadelphia.

Trial is set to begin tomorrow in U.S. District Court on a $10 million lawsuit filed by the family of Geoffrey Francis Bowers.

Philadelphia won an Oscar in 1994 for actor Tom Hanks for his portrayal of lawyer Andrew Beckett, a fictional character fighting his dismissal from a law firm because of AIDS.

Like the movie character, Bowers worked for a major law firm and was fired in 1986 after workers noticed that he had disfiguring facial lesions of Kaposi's sarcoma, an AIDS-related cancer.

Bowers died in 1987 at age 33, shortly after testifying against the New York law firm of Baker & McKenzie in his own lawsuit claiming that he was discriminated against because he had AIDS.

The state human rights board later ordered Baker & McKenzie to pay $500,000 for discriminating against Bowers.

Lawyers for TriStar Pictures Inc., Sony Pictures Entertainment Inc. and individuals who played key roles in the movie's development concede in court papers that two emotional movie scenes were inspired by Bowers' case.

They were a courtroom scene in which Beckett opens his shirt to display his lesions, and one in which Beckett's mother encourages his fight, saying "I didn't raise my kids to sit in the back of the bus."

However, the lawyers maintain both moments were described in published stories that were in the public domain.

Bowers' family, from Medford, Mass., said in their lawsuit that they had negotiated to have a movie made about his struggle but were left out after telling their story to Scott Rudin, a defendant and one of the producers of Philadelphia.

Troubled 'Late Show' switches producers

NEW YORK — A longtime co-executive producer of "Late Show with David Letterman" was abruptly dropped from the program this weekend in the latest change in the comedian's behind-the-camera staff.

Robert Morton, who has worked with Letterman since the early 1980s, will now produce a new comedy, "The High Life," for Letterman's production company, Worldwide Pants.

Morton said he was told of the move by Letterman late Friday. The producer said there was nothing behind the odd weekend announcement or other staff moves on "Late Show."

"I don't think anybody's acting malicious here," Morton said. "I'm personally very pleased with this shift and I'm very encouraged by what we can achieve in the future."

The "Late Show" has slipped in the ratings since July, falling behind NBC's "Tonight Show with Jay Leno." Recently, Letterman has begun to catch up.
