Glenn

Fourteen busloads of people traveled to the launch pad to wave goodbye and take pictures of the crew.

It took longer than planned to get all those people where they needed to be.

It also delayed the crew's training-jet session.

Glenn opted out of the jet flight once it was postponed.

Glenn left the crowd in the front passenger seat of a sporty convertible driven by his commander, Curtis Brown Jr.

"Hey, buckle up!" Brown shouted, and everyone did.

Rothenberg said Glenn is excited about returning to orbit after 36% years, but "totally composed."

"He's treating it like a professional, like a fighter pilot getting ready to fly," Rothenberg said of Glenn's training.

At Tuesday night's beach barbecue, Glenn showed off a photo of himself with his World War II squadron.

his family, sent Glenn the picture so he could autograph it.

"He shared that with the whole crew," said Charles Precourt, a space shuttle commander who is assisting Discovery's crew.

"Since a lot of us are aviators and buffs of history and whatnot, that was quite a thing to be able to share with him," Precourt said.

and heart-rate regulation which could lead to more rested astronauts, Pawelczyk said.

Melatonin is not regulated under federal law because it occurs naturally in some foods and in the brain, according to an article by The Associated Press.

It is available in health stores because it is thought to help regulate sleep.

However, there is no strong scientific evidence at this point to support this theory, according to the article.

John Glenn, who will serve as a payload specialist, is scheduled to participate in the sleep experiments.
