And that’s not all, she said.

“I think he’s really cute, but that’s besides the point,” Wallace said, laughing.

In the way he discussed his post-“Idol” life, it seems as though his fame hasn’t gotten to him. He said he stays in contact with other contestants, enjoys spending time with family and feels like the same Kris Allen—fame or no fame.

Annie Ignasiak (junior human development and family studies) said his decision to tour really proves his devotion to his fan base.

I think it’s really cool that the Idols are going out to see their voters and to see who voted for him.

People that watch American Idol will really appreciate him singing and doing a concert.

While fame can take its toll, Allen said he has done his best to resist it.

“I’ve tried to stay the same person,” Allen said. “It’s obviously changed me, all hopefully for the good.”

His audience tonight will hopefully aid him, good for two reasons: his love of college and his musical ability.

“There is no hate toward Penn State that rhymes,” he said, laughing.
