A TEST OF LOVE

By DWIGHT

Lord Archibald Gray was fond of hunting, riding—indeed, all out of Coor exercises. Being a nobleman and a fine fellow besides, he was a pet of the petticoats. A match had been made for him by his father, the Duke of Fortham, with Lady Geraldine Stanhope, the daughter of a duke. Lord Archibald was well satisfied with Lady Geraldine and seemed to be fond of her alone till Amy Cutburt, the daughter of an American banker, came along, and from that time no one could tell whether Lord Archibald would marry Lady Geraldine or Amy. The Cutburts were very rich and rented a summer house in the neighborhood where Lord Archibald and Lady Geraldine lived. This made a steady thing of the rivalry between the two girls, but that a rivalry was apparent, for what each girl felt no one knew except herself.

For one who had not a noble ancestry Miss Cutburt was remarkably well bred. Indeed, by some she was considered more of a high stepper than her rival. She had more money than Lady Geraldine, but this was her only advantage. The truth is it was an even thing between the two girls, and it was generally believed that Lord Archibald, provided he had his choice, would marry the one he loved.

Autumn came on and with it hunting. Everybody among the aristocracy round about hunted, and parties were made up for the purpose. One afternoon a number of persons set out, mounted, Lord Archibald and his two favorites being of the party. Lady Geraldine was high minded enough to show no unfriendliness to Miss Cutburt, and on the surface at least they were good friends.

On this afternoon the party became scattered into little groups, in some cases individuals. Lord Archibald was riding in a wood when suddenly, emerging from it, he saw Lady Geraldine and Miss Cutburt riding together on the bank of a stream. A horn sounded on the other side, and the two girls turned to cross the stream at a shallow place.

"My God," he exclaimed; "if they cross there they'll get into the quicksand!"

He cried out with all his voice, but it was drowned by the barking of a pack of dogs. Putting spurs to his horse, he dashed down a declivity toward those who were going into danger. Having descended from the bank they passed over a stony bottom to the verge of the stream, and their horses' hoofs began to splash the water, neither riding ahead, but side by side. Then it was noticeable that the animals were having difficulty in withdrawing their feet from the muddy bottom.

Lord Archibald gazed his horse so fiercely that in jumping over an inequality in the ground he fell and sent his rider sprawling ahead of him. The man was not hurt, but arose with an exclamation of impatience and attempted to get his horse on his feet. To fail; the horse had broken a leg. Turning to look at the girls, Archibald saw their horses floundering in the water, both animals having sunk up to their bellies. Looking once more despairingly at his own horse and realizing the impossibility of using him, Archibald ran as fast as his legs would carry him toward the girls. When he reached them the bodies of both horses were nearly covered, leaving only the manes above the surface.

Archibald was alone. He had no horse with which to save them, and if he entered upon the quicksand he would not save them, but add a third victim. He saw on the bank a tree growing on the bank declined over the stream, and he sprang, extended straight out over the pool where the girls were floundering. Climbing out on the branch it might be possible to help them, though it seemed too high to enable him to do so. Gray jumped, caught a lower branch pulled himself up into the tree, then began to crawl out on the limb. As he proceeded his weight bent it lower and by the time he came to the point over which the girls were sinking, by winding his legs around the branch and holding on to it with one hand, he was within reach of both Lady Geraldine and Miss Cutburt.

By this time several persons appeared on the opposite bank and stood looking anxiously on this harrowing scene. When Archibald was in position to render assistance it was a question which girl he would first try to save. Even if he reached one of them so deeply embedded was she that it would be difficult to draw her out. It was evident that only one, if any, could be saved. All watched to see which it would be. Both girls' faces were turned up to him eagerly, imploringly. Archibald hesitated, but only for a moment. Then he extended his hand to Lady Geraldine.

It fell short, but by rocking the branch, she extending her hand, he was enabled to grasp it.

He had scarcely done so when a rope was thrown from the shore and fell between Miss Cutburt and her horse's head. A countryman had witnessed from his home the two girls riding to quicksand and, seizing a rope, had run toward them. Both girls were drawn out by means of the rope. There was no doubt as to which of the two favorites Lord Archibald loved. He married Lady Geraldine. Miss Cutburt went back home and married one of her own countrymen. A Lost Mine.

Among the famous lost mines of the western world and one which is again being sought is the Tisingall of Costa Rica. It is said to have yielded great quantities of gold in the time of the Spanish domination. After quelling the Indian uprisings, however, the Spaniards failed to relocate the mine. It is thought that it lies hidden in the bed of one of the larger streams. Many legends are heard dealing with its wonderful richness, and many attempts have been made to find it, but so far without avail.—Argonaut.

All Wrong. The popular actor had become a soldier. In a hotly contested skirmish he distinguished himself by his courage and gallantry.

"Well, well," said he at the end of the action, "what do you think of that? Not a soul's applauding."—New York Post.

Head For Business. "Has your boy Josh a head for business?"

"Yep," replied Farmer Carntosse. "He's always talkin' about makin' money. I 'nd o' wish his hands was as good for work as his head is for business."—Washington Star.

GENERAL JOFFRE FRENCH COMMANDER

To Marry at Close of War

PARIS, Dec. 21 — Paris is discussing with zest the report that General Joffre, who is a widower, has fallen a victim to the charms of a wealthy and beautiful woman of this city. The wedding will take place, it is expected, after the war. The censor forbids any reference to the story in the newspapers, a move which has stirred up much protest.
