fender, applied for the place in the uniform of a veteran. I have performed my duties to the best of my ability." "It's all right, mamma," pleaded Jeannette. "Your bringing me here has brought me to a decision. I love Arthur and will marry no one else. His wooing has charmed me." Since Arthur was an eligible young man with a fortune Mrs. Wild made a virtue of necessity, forgave them and consented to an early marriage.

Brigadier General George R. Gregory, of Reading, head of the military branch of the Knights of the Golden Eagle, says the 1000 men in his command will be ready to fight if President Wilson and the country need them.
Harold Bachman, of Northampton, who was summoned to answer a charge of auto speeding at Weatherly and ignored the notice, was brought to Weatherly by Chief of Police Auchey and paid a fine of $10, plus costs of $18.50.
After four months of business, during which it is said to have netted about $300, an alleged fraudulent mail order house, owned and operated by sixteen-year-old Stewart Helfrich, of Reading, came to a sudden termination. Detective McGovern, at the instigation of Postal Inspector R. G. Gibbons, arrested Helfrich. He was held for trial in the district court, Philadelphia.

to removing her family and servants there. But, alas, it is difficult for women to get on without men. Mrs. Wild dared not live on the island without one. Besides, she needed one to run her motorboat. There was another reason for a man's presence. Mrs. Wild desired to prevent any of her daughter's suitors from landing on her retreat, and she needed some one strong enough to keep them off.
Mrs. Wild advertised for a person to fill this requirement. Several young men answered her advertisement, but the lady did not engage any of them. She waited till an elderly one applied for the job and engaged him.
John Doolan had white hair and a white beard. But he seemed to be quite strong and said that he was perfectly able to hold the dock against all comers. He went to the island a couple of days before the family to make preparations. When they arrived all was in order for their reception.
As Mrs. Wild had anticipated, they had not been at their summer home long before one of Jeannette's suitors appeared at the dock. He was refused a landing by John Doolan. He sailed around to another part of the island, but John was there with a gun to receive him. Mrs. Wild was so pleased with this action of John's that she gave him a five dollar gold piece. Soon after this another boat appeared, and a handsome young fellow in yachting costume was about to step out on to the landing when John ordered him off. He poked a card at his opposer, but John said that if he were the president himself he could not come ashore. Argument having failed, the visitor tried bribery. John proved incorruptible. There was nothing for the yachtman to do but sail away.
Mrs. Wild, to whom John reported all these noble acts of defense, was delighted. On several occasions he brought the cards that were given him to his mistress. Some of the men who had left them she knew, and some were strangers to her. It made no difference who they were. She had determined to keep men away from her daughter for that summer, and having secured the services of a man who was capable and trustworthy, she gave herself no concern. She declared that it was the first summer she had felt easy about Jeannette since she was fourteen years old.
But one day a thunderbolt came out of a clear sky. The fond mother while taking a stroll over her island, walking through a thick wood heard voices near her. She listened and recognized Jeannette's voice. Then came a man's deeper tones. The latter sounded much like John Doolan.
Could it be that the flirt, deprived of association with men, had cast her toils about the old servant? The suspicion brought a shock to the dotting mother.
Advancing toward the sounds, she peeped through a break in the leaves, and there, sitting on a log with their backs to her, were John and Jeannette. John's arm around Jeannette's waist.

Mrs. Wild tore through the underbrush like a fury. Hearing the noise of breaking brush behind them, the culprits jumped to their feet, turned and confronted the angry mother.
While she was delivering a tirade of reproaches John pulled off his white beard and stood revealed as the most persistent of Jeannette's suitors.
"Woe is me, Mrs. Wild," he said with head bent low. "I confess myself a great sinner. Jeannette wrote me that you were to remove her here, and I, seeing your advertisement for a de-

ARTHUR'S WOOING

By ETHEL HOLMES

Jeannette Wild was an incorrigible flirt. Perhaps it was not her fault; perhaps it was. There was something about her that attracted men, whether it was intentional or not. A pleasant smile hovered about her lips; there was a sparkle in her eye. When she said anything droll she had a way of cocking her head on one side, like a bird, that was very attractive. Jeannette was an innocent girl in every respect, and no word of scandal was ever spoken against her.
But her flirtations were very annoying to her mother. In the first place, her daughter was too young to make an intelligent choice of a husband; in the second, she had not finished her education. When she was nineteen years old, having become entangled with three suitors, her mother resolved upon drastic measures. The spring was coming on, and the good lady, dreading the advantages that summer possessed for love affairs, resolved to take her daughter where a man could not get near enough to fall in love with her.
Mrs. Wild had no confidence in any place of abode that was not isolated. A land fortress would need a moat, which was impracticable. No place would do unless surrounded by water. So an island it must be.
In Casco bay, on the Maine coast, are a number of islands. In the center of one of these islands is a cottage. Mrs. Wild rented this cottage with a view

Facts Versus Fallacies

FACT is a real state of things. FALLACY is an apparently genuine but really illogical statement or argument.

THE difficulties—and the added expense—consequent to seeing that the law is upheld in those portions of the country where "dry" laws are in force, is well exemplified in Kentucky. For in certain portions of that State not only are the United States Revenue officers unable to cope with the moonshine situation, but can count on no help from the local authorities.

THE following from the Louisville Times gives the situation in a nutshell, and shows the rapid increase of illicit distilling in certain portions of Kentucky. Says the Times:

LOUISVILLE KENTUCKY

"MOONSHINING is on the boom in local option territory in Kentucky, particularly in the eastern portion of the State, where coal development is flourishing. This fact is being reported to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue at Washington by B. B. Bouldin, local revenue agent, who said his men informed him that illicit distilling is increasing at such a rapid rate all over the State that extraordinary measures will have to be adopted to meet the situation.

"AND I do not believe that the Government can put enough men in the field to cope with the situation at that," Mr. Bouldin stated. "In order to check this increase in illicit distilling the people and officers of this State and the counties where the licensed sale of liquor has been voted out will have to co-operate with the Government to check the spread of this particular brand of lawlessness.

"IN almost every county where local option prevails," Mr. Bouldin said, "the county and State officers have shown a lack of vigilance in dealing with illicit distilling and evidently expect Government revenue agents to police their territory. We haven't enough men to do this without the co-operation of all the people, and the sale of moonshine whisky increases as a result. We shall continue, of course, with our limited force of agents to check this thing, but it increases in spite of all measures we have taken."

ONCE more is proven what has been said, over and over again, in these articles: that it is a FALLACY to say that Prohibition prohibits, when it is a FACT that all it does is to prevent the legalized and regulated sale of liquor.
