

THE HUNTINGDON GLOBE.

Huntingdon, May 7, 1856.

LOCAL & PERSONAL.

See New Advertisements.

The Trustees of the Huntingdon Presbyterian congregation advertise for proposals for the erection of a Parsonage house in West Huntingdon. Builders and Contractors will take notice.

Reuben Romig advertises for three or four experienced Carpenters, to whom constant employment will be given during the summer season.

Gilliland Dock of Harrisburg, advertises his Foundry and Machine Shop for sale. Machinists and Founders might do well to look after this establishment—it has always paid well.

Levi Westbrook, who has furnished you with boots and shoes to keep your feet warm and comfortable, wants you to pay up—if you don't, you will lose your credit there and be mulet into costs, in the bargain.

THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS.—The Public Schools of this borough commenced their summer session on Monday. The following are the teachers selected by the School Directors for the ensuing school year:

Table with 2 columns: Gender/Class and Name. Includes 1st Male School, 2d Male School, 1st Female School, 2d Female School.

MAX GREENE, Esq.—This gentleman is in Hollidaysburg, and we notice by published correspondence in the papers that he was to have lectured there on Friday evening last. Among the names on the card of invitation we notice those of Dr. H. T. Coffey, Hon. Sam'l Calvin, Thad. Banks, Esq., and Judge Taylor. Mr. Greene in his reply to the committee of invitation, says:

My subject will be "The Kansas Region," and will be descriptive of the country, from actual observation—its general character, soil, scenery, climate, &c.

Mr. G. is an able and interesting writer as we know from his book entitled "The Kansas Region," and a personal acquaintance with him enables us to dub him a gentleman in every respect. We have heard some of our neighbors express their desires that he would call around this way.

History of the Juniata Valley.

We have received from U. J. Jones, Esq., the author, a copy of the History of the Juniata Valley. After what we have heretofore said of the publication it is but necessary for us to add that it fully redeems the promises made in its regard. It is larger, and gotten up in better style than we expected it would be, and no man after reading it can regret the small sum expended on its purchase.

The following tribute to the work is from the pen of one of our citizens who will be readily recognized:

Mr. Lewis:—I have just finished, with some care and much more pleasure, the reading of "Jones' Juniata Valley," but only a few days issued from the press. It is indeed a work of much merit and interest, and it seems impossible how the author could have so well succeeded in gathering the scattered facts of so remote and traditional a period together, as to form so complete and connected a history.

The broken, and sometimes contradictory incidents heretofore given as "Historical Recollections," &c., had led me to suppose that it was beyond the means of any individual of the present day, to collect into anything like historical order, the stirring events and struggles of that remote period, after the actors in its scenes had all left us. But Mr. Jones has succeeded most perfectly, and established his historic ability, also, in the work alluded to, by the most correct and philosophical views of the motives and manners of the times, and of Indian and backwoods character; whilst his rich, flowing, graphic, and English style will not suffer in the most critical comparison with that of the "Leather Stocking," or "Jibensinosay," in description.

Many will receive this work into their houses as an old friend, recognizing within its pages, the stirring "fireside" legends of their ancestors; always to them heretofore, detached and broken, without names or dates, but now, and here, grouped into the consistent, beautiful and true.

My grandfather, himself one of the early settlers upon the Juniata, and myself, born and reared within its valley, I have ever listened with profound delight, to its antiquity and history; and the story of its recollections from the lips of the old, have so often hung around my young brain in childhood, that the dreams of night have been peopled with dusky shadows, and disturbed by horrible war-cries. And so in riper years, have I frequently wished that I could call up before me the hidden and lost actions of its inhabitants, red and white, upon the scenes on which they were enacted.

With this view, have I delighted to converse in my boyhood, with the pioneers of the valley. Henry Lloyd, Esq., of Woodcock Valley, from whose lips I learned the story of the massacre of the two young men near McConnellstown, (the only incident known to me not in this book.) They had left the fort to see about the state of things at home, which the family had deserted for the fort some days before. They were alarmed in their cabin during the night by the barking of a dog, and one of them on opening the door was shot and fell; the other leaped a fence into a patch or garden full of green weeds, when he fell, having also received the enemy's fire. The other, their companion, escaped. Their bodies were brought to the fort the next morning, and slumber with the Donnelly's in Mr. Orbeson's garden; with Col. Fee, my revered and beloved old neighbor, who could tell about the story of the massacre, and who could tell about the death of Louderlager; and his full dark eye would flash when he spoke it, and of the murder of Mrs. Eaton and her children; a daughter in law of whom lived in my father's family, an infirm but irritable inmate, when I was but six years old. Well do I remember old "Betty Eaton," for my young but mischievous bones often felt the weight of her old crutch, as I sang "the 25th of You-ly," mistaking my lisp patriotism in singing the "Battle of Lunly's Lane," for an impeachment of her veracity.—Of his own ludicrous encounter with a yearling colt, when out on a scout on Warriorsbridge, which kept him treading for two hours, waiting for a fair break upon his dark opponent "behind the other tree." He had seen the colt's ear, and heard the cracking of the rubbish, and immediately, as he expressed it, "went to cover," where after watching with impatient wrath for two mortal hours, the poor innocent brute stepped forth from the shade under which it had been resting—and was "only a colt!" and his old eyes would dance and fill with mirth as he recounted the incident.

With Sheriff Patton, himself an actor in the expedition to overtake Weston and the Tories in their march to Kittanning. These, and ten fold more than these, I find embodied in this work, of which I had not heard, now gathered and written after they are all dead and gone.

The battle on page 184, between the tribes of the Tuscaroras and Standing Stone, I remember to have heard spoken of, from my earliest recollection. As a historical fact, I think, nothing is better attested. But what were its details, its great warriors names, its order and strategy—its survivors or victims; its deeds of personal prowess, its causes, and its end, and ten fold more than these, I find embodied in this work, of which I had not heard, now gathered and written after they are all dead and gone.

This was in the year 1802; and up till that day, no white man knew the precise spot. But upon breaking up the clearing, for the extent of an acre, he found his shovel plow, then used for that purpose, rotting and bounding among human bones, confined and settled in the bound earth by the weight of more than a century. He stopped to examine, when he first unsealed this charnel bed, struck with curiosity, and he often told me, that amid that decayed mass of human relics, he counted at least twelve skull bones, in which time and decay, and the decomposing forces of nature had not been able to destroy the machinery of the brain.

A sale will be made on liberal terms, and to enterprising men this is a rare opportunity to embark in a well established business. For further information address GILLIARD DOCK, Harrisburg, Pa. May 7, 1856.
