Shade Tree Planting.

The following, from the American Agriculturist, confirms our own experience in regard to shade trees. We have, as a general thing, pursued the method here laid down for trimming and planting .- Elitor Compiler.]

As 'soon as the frost is out of the ground, holes should be dug for the Spring planting of trees, and as soon as the ground becomes settled they should be set out. The sap then is only moderately active. Take them up carefully, with all the root you can get. Pare off the wounded parts with a sharp knife; trim out and shorton the tops, heading them back, that strong thrifty shoots may put out for Summer growth. They make a much better and earlier top than when left with long branches with a sluggish circulation which frequently die the first, or second Summer, and never make a satisfactory or well formed top. If the natural root of the tree be fibrous, or compact in its rootlets like the horse-chestnut, or maple, if they be cut short, and properly pruned of their longer leaders, it will be no damage to their future growth if properly set, and covered in at planting.

When planted, if at all exposed to injury from animals, or outside influences, they should be well guarded by stakes. Don't select large shade trees-over three inches at the base of the stemnor take them out of tall, close, woods. If they be taken from a natural forest Surveyor for the county of Adams growth, let them be from the skirts of address, Emmisburg, Md. the wood; or, better than either, from a nursery, Forest trees are now much grown in nurseries, and they are far the THE Perry County Mutual Fire Insurance best. Elms, Horse-chestnuts, and Maand the effect is more imposing where and promptly adjusts its losses. (Ulmus Americana)—the true white Elm of the forest-have such diversity of shape, that even if no others were intermixed, they afford great variety. The Horse-chestnut is compact and uniform in appearance; while the different varieties of Maple, in wood, bud, leaf, color of foliage, and habit of branch, are the most varied of all our forest trees. Oaks, Beeches, Hickories, and Nutwoods generally, are hard, and prongy in root, and mostly refractory livers and growers in transplantingrearcely one in twenty succeeding, unless taken from nurseries or open grounds. We do not recommend them, variety. The Tulip, or White Wood Land Warrants, Back-pay supended Claims, istration accounts hereinafter mentioned will an evergreen now and then, and with to him personally or by letter. your Eims, Maples, and Horse-chestnuts, your shade trees are complete.
