But though the numbers engaged in the battle were almost unprecedentedly large, it was evidently one of the least decisive of the great battles of the world's history. There was hard fighting on both sides, and the French, having gained their point, crossed the Ticino, and driving their adversaries from their former positions, are fairly entitled to the palin of victory. Yet there was no rout of the Austrians. Prisoners were captured by both armies. The French took three Austrians cannon and two standards, and the Austrians took one cannon from the French. While Louis Napoleon reports that 12,000 Austrians were placed horse de combat, there are rumors rt Paris that the French loss was from 2,000 to 12,000 men. It the Austrians had been badly beaten, or had retreated in disorder, a much larger number of their cannon would have been captured, and there would have been a much greater disparity in the loss of the respective armies.
