The Pennsylvania Campaign of '59. The political campaign of 1853, in Penn-sylvania, may now be said to be fully opened:

The two parties have held their Conventions and nominsted their candidates. There are important considerations involred in this contest, which cannot be overloaked and disregarded by any good citizen...... Pennaylvanin has great interests that are to be entrusted to the State officers who shall be

Of the Opposition candidates, Cochran and Keim, it cannot be regarded as an unjust disparagement to say that in no respect have followed; after which went the whole tribe, they superior claims or qualifications, and that singing the funeral hymn. On reaching they there is nothing in their history to recommend them specially to the confidence of the people in preference to their Demouratic competitors. They are certainly not of equal experience, and neither of them has reputation for, or given evidence of, that peculiar trait of diar-acter which points out a man as one proeminently fitted for trusts requiring in their proper julilment the most rigid honesty and any ending firmness in behalf of the State, and against all efforts to defraud or wrong her. Dom serats can have no hesitation as to their course in this contest. Regard for the State interests and duty to their Party, happily unite in recommending, aye, in dictating, a cordial, earnest and active support of Richardon L. Wright and John Rowe, for Auditors General and Surveyor-General. There is nothing in the past or present, to warrant of excuse a contrary line of action, on the part of any who profess the name of Democrat, or who desire to continue in fellowship with the party. And if we look to the future, the cussiderations demanding present union and concert of action in support of these numinees, cannot be honorably disregarded. The con-test of '59 is but preliminary to that of '60, which will decide whether Pennsylvania is to Le an Abolition or a Democratic State ; and in view of that issue and the importance of its "Ah, Julius, what was dat?" The Democracy of Pennsylvania have an important. perhaps a decisive part to act in that great national struggle. Therefore it becomes them to propare to acquit themselves creditably and successfully then, by acting now with that union and energy which will bring success in October next. And why, with such candidates as Wright and Rowe, shall the Democracy of Pennsylvania nos Le triumphant? We know of reason, in the past, the present, or the future, that should restrain any Democrat from laboring for such a result. Lecomptonism and Anti-Lecomptonism are gone, never to retarn again.
