

GETTYSBURG. PA.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 5, 1864.

Congress meets to-day.

GEORGE B. McCLELLAN.

In the future of America, a time is sure to shall have passed, candor and reason will resume their proper sphere, and men will', look back upon the past in a different spirit from that in which they survey the present. Men who to-day will not listen to a word spoken in defence of a political opponent, and who yet would feel insulted to be told that they are not in their right minds, will then reflect with a feeling akin to shame upon the injustice they have done in words spoken derogatory to the fair fame of a man whom History will set down in the list of America's most honored patriots.

General McClellan can afford to wait the sure vindication of History. Of him it will be written that the man who twice saved the capital of the nation, still offered his sword to his country in her time of need, and was spurned by the men in power .-His retirement from her service will be attended by no regret-no feeling that a duty has been left undone. If he can do the country no further service in the present struggle, it will be some consolation to know that partizan malice can do him no further harm. We do not suppose a contingency can arise which would again withdraw him from the position of a private citizen until the nation which once honored him with its confidence shall have passed from the uncertainty of the present into the brighter light or deeper gloom that awaits it in the future.

THE FORTHCOMING DRAFT.

Previous to the election, one of the Washington correspondents of the World stated incidentally that the east for five hundred thousand men had been a failure, and that | ing and intelligent public, that confidence the necessities of the service were such that in the future unity of the States, and in the plesswhen they ask us to step in and share nia, as stated by General Cameron, there a new draft would certainly be ordered would have been caused if we had been able are entitled to the sole credit, if they full proxy vote as before!
