the right to give the widest range to our foreign commerce, without any annoying interference from European powers, while our past attitude and past course should be an assurance to such powers that, in secking our own good, our purposes are not aggressive nor threatening to their welfare or security. The rapid growth of this country and its territorial expansion, have resulted from the legitimate exercise of sovereign rights, and ought to cause no unfriendly sentiments with those who have never neglected the opportunity to add to their possessions. The President refers to the efforts made by a proper foundation. Great Britain and France observe the principle, but do not recognize it as an international right; but the Executive has applied to the leading powers to adopt the eluded a convention to that effect. Prussia approves of a treaty to that effect, with an ad- ject. ditional provision against privateering. But
