

Bob Wadden's Horse Trade. "You know Bob Wadden, I guess?" said Uncle Mike.

"Well, Bob was an amazin' hand at tradin' horses, and generally came out ahead, too. I never knew him really girdled and the underbrush cut, but once."

"How was that, Uncle?" "Why, you see, Bob had been gettin' a gray horse, in some of his dealin's, that was just about as nice a horse to look at as ever put his nose through the rack-sticks; he was a human lookin' horse, and nothin' shorter; he was always lookin' arter stars, and carried his tail like the national flag on the Fourth of July; but he wouldn't work—he was above it; he'd almost stop when he saw his shadow followin' him, for fear he might be drawn in."

"Now, then," says Bob, "some individual is bound to be picked up." "So, makin' an excuse that old Gray's shoes wanted fixin', he sent him to the blacksmith's, he harnessed up his 'other horses, hitched them to a wagon-load of stone, drove down to Sam Hewitt's, stopped before the door, took out the near horse and harnessed up the Gray in his place, went in, took a drink, and waited around till some feller should come along who wanted to speculate."

"He hadn't waited long when he seen some feller comin' down the road like all creation, his horse under a full run, while he was sawin' the bits and hollerin' 'wo! wo!' with all his might and main. He managed to stop him after a little by Sam Hewitt's, and turnin' him around he cum up a slappin' his hands, an in a tearin' passion with his horse:

"He's never ready to stop," says he "that horse ain't, an' though he's the best horse I ever owned, yet I'm determined to get slint of him." "Well, just then out comes Bob, and mounted his wagon just as if he was going to drive off, when he says: "Hollo, stranger, perhaps you'd like to deal with me for a steady one?" "Why, yes," said the stranger, "I would like something a little more quiet than that go-head-rascal of mine."

"So Bob looked at the Sorrel, and found him a square-built animal, his eye full of fire, and every muscle in play. "Well," says Bob, after a few words with me, "there's my Gray—here's your Sorrel: what's your proposition?" "Now you're talkin'," said the stranger, examining the Gray as he stood hitched to the load of stone, "I'll give you the Sorrel and the best forty dollar clock in my wagon for the Gray."

"Done!" said Bob, "just whitch." "Neither of them asked t'other any questions, 'cause neither of them wanted to answer any. The horses were exchanged. Bob got his clock, and the stranger got into his wagon, took up his lines, and, bidding 'em good bye, was about to start, when the Gray put a stop to it and wouldn't budge a hair. In vain did the stranger whip and coax—not an inch could he get.

"There sat Bob, laughing in his sleeve, almost ready to burst, to see how the stranger was tryin' to start and couldn't. Not a word did the stranger say, however, but after he had got quite tired, and given up tryin' it any more, he came and sat down on the horse clock.

"Bob thought he might as well be goin'; so, pickin' up the ribbons—go along," says he. The Sorrel turned his head and looked back at him, as much as to say "Don't you wish I would?" but didn't stir or pull. In vain Bob coaxed and patted; Sorrel was there and wasn't anywhere else.

"Well, I reckon it's my turn to laugh, now," said the stranger: "I suppose you'll call again when you come to town." "Oh, never mind," says Bob. "Sorrel will go, or else you couldn't get here with him."
