MOON WAS ONCE PART OF EARTH

SAN FRANCISCO, Sept. 6.—Professor W. H. Pickering, of Harvard, the astronomer, is here on his return from a visit to the Hawaiian Islands. He makes the interesting statement that although he had never seen the volcanoes of the Hawaiian Islands previous to his recent trip, he recognizes in them old familiar friends.

While in Honolulu Professor Pickering delivered a lecture in which he advanced the theory that the moon was originally a part of the earth and was thrown off and that the Hawaiian Islands were about in the center of this lunar globe. The space that was left when the moon material was thrown off is the Pacific Ocean.

Highways on Lime Ridge. Lime Ridge was the scene of a hold-up Saturday night, in which Harry Wertman, the D. L. & W. ticket agent, was the victim.

After the departure of the last train, which reaches Danville at 9:10, Mr. Wertman closed his office and started for his home in Lime Ridge, about a mile away. It was quite dark and rainy and when about half way home he was held up.

The highwaymen were very daring, but they lacked a little in cleverness, as they unwittingly returned to the owner sixty-five dollars which they had taken out of his pocket.

TWENTY-SIX DEAD BY LAKE DISASTER

PEQUAMING, Mich., Sept. 6.—Twenty-six have been added to a death list from the great gale on Lake Superior, practical confirmation of the loss of the steamer Isoco and her tow the Olive Jeanette having been received at this port.

Both vessels are believed to have foundered near Huron Island. The tug D. L. Hibard reports finding life preservers marked "Isoco".

The stem of a schooner had been thrown up on the end of point Abway. The body of a sailor was found ten miles this side of the point.

The light house keeper on Huron Island reports having plainly seen a big schooner founder four miles north of the light house Sunday afternoon. This is believed to have been the Jeanette. The Isoco was not near at the time but she had not been heard from since all hope for her has been given up.

The Isoco and Jeanette laden, with iron ore 1-ft Duluth Thursday noon for Lake Erie. They were caught by the storm when half way down Lake Superior and must have been driven back to the island of Keweenaw.

Both boats apparently were overcome by the gale long before they reached Huron Island.

Both boats were owned by W. A. Hawgood and Company of Cleveland. The Olive Jeanette has been fatal to the steamer that has towed her.

Five years ago the steamer L. R. Doty started out from Chicago with the schooner in tow, mounted a furious gale and sank with all on board.

Captain Charles Rousseau and the engineer and fireman of the Canadian Fishing tug Shamrock were drowned yesterday when their boat was sunk in collision with the steamer W. O. Richardson of point Aux Pins.

Census and School Teachers. The conclusion of educators, that "knowledge comes, but wisdom lingers" is confirmed by the United States census, and has been just announced in a treatise devoted to school teachers.

According to the census there are many more school teachers than there used to be. Twenty years ago the average size of a class in the schools was 137, the age of the pupils ranging between 5 years and 25.

When the census was taken, the average class numbered 71, and there were more scholars being taught. This is proven that there are more teachers. And it is most interesting to note that the majority of these teachers are sons and daughters of foreigners who have come to this country to settle.

Most of them are daughters, for the proportion of female teachers is always on the increase. There are now three women teachers to one male, while 25 years ago they were almost equally divided.

The cities naturally have more teachers to the population than the country districts and small towns. The public school systems are better developed in the centers of population.

Eighty per cent. of the city teachers are women. The figures show, too, that the average of the women is higher than in the years gone by.

However, the Pittsburgh Press finds that there is one vital point that is left out in the treatise, that is, that these women teachers, as a rule, are poorly paid and do more work, for less money, than any other class of people in the country.

Some day when they are appreciated at their true worth, they will get justice, and that will mean more money.

Quail Will be Scarce. Hunters do not look forward to a very good season this year so far as quail are concerned.

The severe winter and the disease among quail have conspired to reduce the number of the gamey little birds very much, while so far as this section is concerned the number of the birds each year is growing less and less until in the relatively near future they will approach extinction.

Quail during last winter were found dead by the hundreds throughout this county. Death in most instances is no doubt was due to the severe weather, but it is suspected that a good many were the victims of disease.

Four hundred quail were purchased from a New England party by several of our local sportsmen last spring for the purpose of stocking the woods of Montour county. Who the birds' heads of Danville they were nearly all dead or sick, so that they did soon afterward only about half a dozen in all survived and those were turned loose in the woods.

The Voice of Experience. The wedding is to occur soon, and she was telling her mother about her plans.

"When Fred is out late at night," she said, "I shall not scold him. I shall try to be reasonable. I think I shall go so far as to keep a light burning for him to make him cheery when he returns."

Her mother was silent.

"Don't you think it would be a good idea to keep the light burning?" she persisted.

"Well, it might do very well for the first month or so. But after you have paid a few gas bills you'll probably conclude that it will be just as well to put the matches where he can find them and turn the light out."—New York Press.

Why were you in there, at a desk?

A Job In the Senate Chamber

By Frank H. Sweet Copyright, 1905, by Frank H. Sweet

She went up the middle steps and turned around the corner to the right. A long line was extending back from the door, expectant, impatient, though the visitors' gallery would not be open to the public until 12.

She drew from her belt the one remaining link of former opulence. It was a watch, and she slipped the watch back with a scarcely breathed sigh. Why had she come here at all, she thought accusingly? She would be better visiting the stores in search of a position as clerk. There were surely some business houses she had not yet been in. And—no!—no!

Her eyes were brighter, and a flush came and descended to her lips in a soft, evanescent smile that was more like the smile of the old days before the wifely duties.

She had been standing at the post-office door, and had looked precisely as he had that day when he parted from them in the Arizona canyon, he a penniless prospector and her father an extensive mine owner. And he had not forgotten. Even before she saw him he had sprung from a carriage, without regard to his horses, and was coming up the postoffice steps with outstretched hands.

"Good evening! You here, Muriel—Miss Ashburton?" he had cried, with a gladness in his voice which he did not attempt to conceal and which brought an answering color to her face and light to her eyes.

There had been nothing between them except a look and hand pressure, but she had often thought of him in these latter dreary years and was glad to know he had remembered her. "I looked for you everywhere—everywhere," he had continued, "but without a clue. I was afraid you had gone from my life. But pardon me, we cannot talk here, and I have a great deal to say. May I call on you at once—this evening? Is your father here?"

"My father is dead," she had managed to say. Her brain had been in a whirl, her heart in a tumult. What did it all mean? What was this impetuous madman saying, implying? By a strong effort she had controlled herself.

"Yes, you may call," she had answered. "I will be glad to see you." And she had given him the number of the house in which she rented one small room.

"Thank you. I will be there early. I would ask to go back with you now, but I have an appointment. Some are already overdue. I am, I think, a little late for this meeting. I have been in Washington only three days, and to turn up against you like this!"

"Have you employment here?" he had asked for want of something better to say.

"Yes, temporarily; a job in the senate chamber. You remember I was a jack of all trades, from a farm boy to an impetuous prospector, with occasional dips at fresco painting and journalism to help me through college. But I will not detain you here in the wind any longer."

She had watched him spring into the carriage and drive away, an odd light in her eyes and a warm color in her cheeks. She had seen him in the side-walk she laughed softly. Eight years before she would not have been like this. Evidently he was without any regular employment, just doing some temporary work in the senate chamber.

But she was not to be deterred by spoken of being familiar with that. At first, from his being in the carriage holding the horses, she had thought he might be a coachman, waiting for his employer's return. But after all, what did it matter? Conman or Conner or impetuous prospector, he was warm hearted and honest and ambitious. She could read that in his eyes and in the strong, full grasp of his hands. And he had remembered her and—cared for her. It was a great thing to be in the hurrying, indifferent world there was one who still thought of her and cared for her a little. The manner or lack of employment was such a small matter compared with that. Knowledge of life soon leveled such petty distinctions.

Almost unconsciously her steps had turned toward the capitol. The only alternative seemed a continuation of her search for employment, and, somehow, she shrank from that. Just now, even though she had been restricting herself to a single meal a day for a week. She would celebrate the finding of a friend. It was opening day at the senate chamber and would be unusually interesting, and perhaps she might see this friend himself, or some of the work he had been doing.

There was a sudden stir in the line ahead of her, and she felt herself being pushed forward. The door was open at last, and foot by foot, yard by yard, she was being inhaled toward it. But when she entered every seat was taken, and she could only crowd herself into the narrow space behind the last row. She could see the chaplain and a few of the senators on the far side of the chamber and upon the few desks in sight a group of men in business suits.

Presently she heard the opening prayer and bowed her head. Then there was a confusion of voices, with quick, crisp sentences from one desk and another, followed by a short recess for the members to get up and stretch their hands and introduce among the senators. At the end of fifteen or twenty minutes some of those in the visitors' gallery began to rise and leave. They had witnessed the opening and were now going home to lunch. Soon she was able to step down to a vacant seat in one of the front rows.

She had now a good view of the chamber, and her gaze swept curiously from desk to desk. Many of the senators she recognized from pictures she had seen in current periodicals. Suddenly she started and half arose. She had not thought to see him down there; if she met him at all it would be in one of the corridors, and probably at work. But there he was, at one of the desks, wearing some papers.

"What did it mean? He had no right to be in there now, while the senate was in session.

An hour later she descended to the next floor, still dazed and wondering. As she left the elevator she met him face to face.

"What you here, Muriel—Miss Ashburton?" he cried. "This is splendid! Now we can have that talk without waiting until evening. I know a cozy little table down in a corner of the cafe where we can be by ourselves. We will talk while we eat our lunch. Come."

She was looking at him with wide eyes.

"Why were you in there, at a desk?"

Edge of the New Season--Ladies' Garments Lead

Wooltex Are Paris Styles Americanized

Many of the Fall and Winter Styles Are Now Here. Let Us Tell You What They Are Like

Style News--Read It Now

HE tailored suit recently strayed from the straight and narrow path of original severity, and grown gay and frivolous with frills and fur-bows, has come back again to its original lines. It never was quite congruous, the fussing and frilling of the tailored suit and best dresses never contented it.

Welcome, then, the strictly tailor-made. The American woman seems built for it, and certainly it's built for her. Blouses have been displaced. Fitted and semi-fitted styles prevail. The blouse was said to be kindly concealing defects of the figure. The fitted garment was said to be merciless to imperfection. This last is true only when wrongly built. But made Wooltex way, cut right, shaped and modeled and fashioned to a perfect model figure, it endows the wearer with the lines of perfection also.

The distracting pretty curves of the figure are nowhere in the world brought out better than in the Wooltex fitted coat, and curved shaps. And there is the fact the Wooltex idea involves, a style suitable to every woman, whatever her particular and individual type may be, tall and slender or short and stout. This season there is variety multiplied. There's the suit with the long coat very prominent, and this may be fitted or the redingote style, though few of the latter are seen.

There are fly-front styles which naturally take flapped pockets, a nice little harmonizing style that the Wooltex artists understand well. There's the long plain coat that buttons straight down from the bust to well below the hip line. It's built out well on the shoulders and shapes in with an underarm curve that is the perfection of grace. It produces the typical American girl—the Gypon style—broad shoulders supple, well poised and it magnifies every grace of the wearer.

Double breasted styles afford still another variety. They are cut in one or with tunic effect in circular shape, smoothly adjusted to the close-fitting body at the hip line with the becomingly curved hip line or seam.
