News From H. M. Saunders a Resident of San Francisco During the Earthquake.

[To Richard W. Eggert, founder of the Danville Gem. The news although a little late; is intensely interesting and should be read by every subscriber of the Intelligencer—Ed.]

Pioneer San Francisco received a rude awakening Wednesday morning. April 18, 1906.

The awful call came without warning like a mysterious bolt of light

If the seismic disturbance had occurred in the daytime when the busy thoroughtares of the metropolis were lined with people, or in the evening, when the theatres were crowded, there would have been a still more horrifying chapter in the world's history than the one which the city by the Golden Gate has just contributed. Terrible as the distress and the calamity appear, the people of San Francisco and California have ample cause for genuine and deep-felt gratitude.

The earthquake shock did much damage.

There is as little use in denying this fact as there is in exaggerating the results of the templor.

The earthquake shock did much damage.
There is as little use in denying this fact as there is in exaggerating the results of the temblor.
The first heavy shock, a few minutes after five in the morning, struckterror to the bravest and coolest of the city's sleeping populace. In a few seconds the streets in the residence districts were lined with people who rushed out of their apartments and homes in night attire. Furniture, pianos, book cases danced through the rooms as if possessed with demonsic crockery and china ware dashed out of their snug closets on the floors; chinneys toppled over and houses cracked, crushed and caved in.
The lower portions of the city, and particularly where the buildings were resting on "filled" ground, seemed to have fared the worst.
The region along Seventeenth, Eighteenth and Nineteenth streets, from Dolores down to Potrerb avenue, was badly shattered, as was also the neighborhood bounded by Mission, Seventh, Harrison and Fourth streets. In Hayes Valley the earthquake did considerable damage, and the City Hall was badly shaken.

Most of the old buildings along Montgomery street and east towards the water front were badly cracked by the shock.
The Valencia Hotel, near Eighteenth street, caved in, and in the fall killed a number of the lodgers and injured others.
The large five-story Brunswick Hotel on Sixth and Howard streets, with its three hundred rooms which are all reported to have been occupied, collapsed to the ground.

Another lodging house on Seventh and Howard streets was crushed to the ground by a falling brick wall. But few of the occupants of these houses escaped.

A portion of the large Cosmopolitan House, on the corner of Fifth and Mission streets, went down with the first shock. Some of the lodgers were buried in the ruins, but many escaped and found a place of refuge on the Mint steps.

The Portland House, on Sixth street, between Mission and Market, sollapsed, and it is stated that about sixty persons were entombed among the crashing ruins. Their heart-rending cries for help were heard a block away. A large number of these, however, were saved before the green overtook them and taken to the emerate overtook them and the emerate overtook them and taken to the emerate but within the annals of the world.

Terrible as the disaster still appears before our eyes, it has already been fraught with many and wonderful blessings, and San Francisco's sad misfortune will in time prove to have been her best fortune.

The shake, the fire, revealed the true character of her people.

It is true that such a catastrophe could not help but open the gates for the very worst that has found lodgement in mankind, but the depraved element constituted only an indefinite fraction when compared to that ocean of kindness which rushed from self-sacrificing, brave human souls during the three days and three nights of horror.

Nobody knew before the calamity that San Francisco possessed so many hundred thousand unselfish and courageous women, kind hearted and

There has been not only a crashing of buildings, a leveling of fortunes, but a moulding of character—a people tempered in the strongest crucible and thus qualified for the greatest of human tasks—the re-building of Greater San Francisco as one of the

A goodly number of the marriages in Venango county do not seem to have been made in heaven.
