"So," he said, carefully controlling his voice to the tones of polite interest—"so you did miss us!"

Miss them! She thought hew intensely she had missed them—and him. Yes. Bob! During the three months of her absence she had come to long for the sound of his voice, the merry laugh in his eyes. How happy she had feit when she saw him at the station thought before! Not that she meant to show her change of feeling toward him. She had refused him too emphatically before sailing to willingly acknowledge that she had made a mistake. For a time she would not acknowledge it even to herself.

But she had never thought that Bob would so destroy the beauty of his home, the home she had learned to love.

"Oh, Boh!" she cried tearfully, ambiguously. "How could you?" Then she ran precipitately to her own home.
Bob gazed after her dubiously. Perhaps her father was right, but he had a young woman on the string down there. He is very attentive to her, they say. Of course I wouldn't tell you if I thought that there was any possibility of your reconsidering the answer you gave Bob in the spring. You can't blame the boy for seeking consolation, and they say that she is very wealthy." The girl forced herself to eat her salad calmly. So that was the reason he had taken her homecoming so easily. Another woman had captured his fancy. Well, she would keep her secret.

The next day Bob came over to the house for a conference with her father. Meeting bim in the hallway, she questioned him as to the day of his departure, although she hated herself for doing it.

"Oh, in about a month!" said Bob in-differently and hurrledly.

How different from the way he used to speak to her, she thought. During that month Bob made many

During that month Bob made many trips to the city, and each morning the girl woke up to gaze from her windows at the signs with a deep accentuation of the hittend with which she had regarded them on the first day of her return. To her they began to seem the personification of the woman that had taken Bob from her—the cold, calculating business spirit. How she nate those signs! It seemed to her as if she would do anything to get rid of them. Must she live within their sight all her life, constantly reminding her of the love she had lost? The thought was unendurable, and she appealed to was unendurable, and she appealed to her father.

"I can't do anything," said he. "Bob has a contract with the Chee-Rup company, and he must live up to it. If only you had been kind to him this wouldn't have happened. To my mind it only shows what good sense Bob has. This place has no more attrac-tions for him, so why not make it yield an income?

has. This place has no more attractions for him, so why not make it yield an income?"

The evening before the day set by Bob for his departure he called. The girl was seated on her veranda as far as possible from the sight of the sign-boards. Her parents had gone out for the evening, and she received Bob with a strange, sinking feeling. This might be the last time he would come to see her—alone.

"Bob," said she when he had seated himself at a safe distance—"Bob, now that you are going away, probably forever, can't you do something about those awful signboards?"

He regarded her quizzically.

"I wish I could," said he, "but you see the Chee-Rup company's contract runs for ten years, and the advertisement has proved to be so good that they would not release me unless I paid a sum of money that would absolutely break me."

Ten years! A life time!

"Bob," she cried impulsively, "I would be willing to do anything to get rid of those dreadful signs!"

Bob looked at her quickly. This was ose dreadful signs! Bob looked at her quickly. This was his hour. Her father and mother had hesitated at wagering his happiness on a short sentence. Nevertheless he must make the plunge some time, and the present moment seemed as propitious as any.

"So you would really like to get rad of them?" he asked. "Well, I believe we could arrange that with the company satisfactorily if you could recor sider your decision of some months

"Why, Bob," she said, "I believe that you are asking me to marry you again!"

He gazed at her in well simulated smarzement.

"What other woman?" he asked.

"That wealthy one in the city—that business woman whom my father said you had on the string."

Bob smiled broadly.

"You evidently misunderstood in what connection I had her on the string. We are going to sell her the business."

The girl looked at him happily.

"If that's the case," said she, "I suppose I might change my answer to that question if you are sure about taking down those signs. You mustn't sacrifice a lot of money to those people, Bob. We'll need some."

"No, I'll not," said he as he folded her in his arms. "You see, your father and I happen to be the Chee-Rup Breakfast Food company, although we are on the point of selling the business to that woman in the city, and so, I guess, there will be no trouble about having that contract annulled."
