These ditches or droise are usually on hills and vary in depth from eight to fifteen inches and are admirably adapted to the breaking of wagons and carriages. It looks very much as though the people were careless in the construction and repairs of the roads, and no thought of anything ex-

coper getting credit for their taxes.—
Would it not be to the advantage of all concerned to make an improvement in the manner of building and repairing our roads?

Could not our roads be very much improved without any additional taxation? Let the work be done in the proper season, when the ground is in the best condition, at which time hands can do more and with botter results. Let the people see to it, that hereafter, our roads are in better condition. Good roads enhance better condition.
