The Adlington Homicide.

TUESDAY, JUNE 4, 1867. The prisoner, John B. Adlington, was brought into court by the sheriff.

The court then ordered the arraignment of John B. Adlington on an indictment for the murder of James H. Teeple.

Whereupon, Mr. Thompson, for the prisoner, asked leave of court for a few minutes conversation with his client, which was granted.

After which, the clerk proceeded with the arraignment. He read the bill of indictment, charging John B. Adlington with the murder of James H. Teeple, at the house of John Oliver, in Portersville, Butler county, on the night of December 24th, 1866, by stabbing him with a knife, of which he died soon after.

To this indictment the defendant pleaded guilty.

His honor, Judge McGuffin, said in the first case, for the murder of Sidney B. Cunningham, tried at the last term, on which a motion for a new trial had been made and argued at the adjourned court in April, and held under advisement, the court were of the unanimous opinion that a new trial should be granted.

To that conclusion this morning, he was unprepared with a written opinion, but would state some of the reasons for this decision. The evidence had been carefully and accurately reported and printed. They had read it attentively, and were of opinion it did not warrant a verdict beyond that of murder in the second degree.

They cast no reflections upon the jury who tried the prisoner. They were intelligent and conscientious men. We think they erred on the degree of guilt.

In the absence of proof of deliberation, on the part of the Commonwealth, the law would fix the grade in the second degree. The meeting at Oliver's on the night of the 24th of December, 1866, was for a lawful purpose.

The young ladies and gentlemen had met for a party; they had been interrupted by violent and improper language from the deceased men in the early part of the evening, and Adlington, and others, had been requested to be prepared to assist John Oliver in case of further disturbance.

Cunningham and Teeple had promised to conduct themselves gently, for the remainder of the evening, in consideration of being permitted to participate in the party.

The disturbance afterwards was such as to cause excitement, anger, hot blood. The fact that the prisoner gave warning when he flourished the knife, rebutted the presumption of premeditation; if he had pre-determined to kill, he would not have exhibited the knife and given warning.

The learned Judge descanted at some length on the testimony, and the law as applicable to the facts disclosed, but which a lack of space precludes our publishing in this issue. We may find room in our next.

The defendant's counsel then asked leave to withdraw the plea of "not guilty," to the indictment for the murder of Sidney B. Cunningham, and enter a plea of "guilty."

The court permitted this to be done. Judge McGuffin said it now became the duty of the court to fix the grade of the homicide, which from a careful consideration of the law and the facts they should place on the record as murder in the second degree.

The court then addressed the prisoner, and asked him if he had any thing to say why sentence should not be pronounced? If so, an opportunity was now offered.

At this stage of the proceedings there was some confusion manifested in the audience, in their anxiety to get close enough to hear what might be said by the prisoner. After order was restored, Mr. Adlington arose and said:

"I will say to this honorable court, to my little family and my aged mother around me, I am not guilty of the crime, as they have made me say. I am not guilty. That's all I have to say."

The court, after lecturing the prisoner on the enormity of his offense and reminding him of the very narrow chance he had of escaping with his life, and expressing the hope that in his solitary cell in the penitentiary he would reflect and seek forgiveness for his crimes, proceeded to pronounce sentence. On the first indictment for the murder of Sidney B. Cunningham, "that you, John B. Adlington, pay a fine of five dollars to the Commonwealth, the costs of prosecution, and undergo an imprisonment of solitary confinement at hard labor in the Western Penitentiary of Pennsylvania, for a period of twelve years."

House Burned. On Friday last, about 12 o'clock, at the dwelling of Jacob Cropp, in Butler township, was entirely destroyed by fire.

On the second indictment, for the murder of James H. Teeple, the Court said if the indictment had charged the homicide as having been the second offense, they would have been compelled to sentence him for life; but it had not been so averred, and he would have to sentence him as though it was the first offense.
