Making Manure in Summer.

With manure enough and labor enough, no man knows what may be the limits to the products and profits of the cultivation of the earth, in the the limits to the products and profits of the cultivation of the earth, in the garden or the field. We make most manure in winter, because then our stock is confined and all the droppings with the litter and waste of fodder, are readily accumilated. Cows yarded every night, leave their droppings and urine where they may be used, to compost heaps in a more active fermentation. Thus, the value of the maure made in summer from a given number of cows or other animals may be nearly as great as in winter though if they are pastured, they may be in the yard less than half the time.

Swine used simply as pork producers or breeders, are oftentimes of profit but on three quarters of the farms west of the Alleghanies, if the value of the manare made by pigs were left out of the calculation, they would show a loss on the balance sheet of the farm. To employ them asma nure makers to the best advantage, in connection with either private.

Here are postured, we make most many even, may in this way unite in inspection of grantic or marble some justicing on granite or marble

Every gardener, and not less every farmer, ought to begin the growing season ought to begin the growing season with half grown hogs, not with a lot with half grown hogs, not with a lot of little pigs. They should receive as regular attention as the rows of vegetables or plants, for they are preparing the raw material with which to produce next year's crop.

The accumulations in the hog-pen should be leveled off, and mixed somewhat by hand, but the hogs ordinarily do this themselves tolerably well. If left thus water-soaked, and trodden hard the manure will be of the rankest, strongest character. of the rankest, strongest character imaginable, and besides so tough and stringy that it can only be gotten out with great labor. It is best, therefore, to take time, some rainy day, about once a month, to clear the pen out, and lay the materials up in a compact compost heap, well trodden, and if possible, under cover. The action of the air will cause rapid and
