UNPLEASANT PEOPLE .- There is a class of uppleasant people often met with in the world, whose unpleasantness it is difficult to assign the cause for. They are not neces sarily unkind persons; they are not ungen erous; and they do not appear to talk on act from any malice. <sup>1</sup> But somehow or other they are mostly unfortunate in what they say. They ask the wrong thing, or they omit to ask the right. They bring for ward the disagreeable reminiscence, the ludicrous anecdote about you which you would rather not hear repeated in a large company, the painful circumstance which you wish was well buried and out of sight If you have any misfortune they rush to prove to you that your own folly was the cause. If you are betrayed, they know it would be so, and remember that they have often told you so. They cannot imagine that the poor unfortunate man is not in a state just then to hear all this wisdom. In fact to use a metaphor. it seems as if they had supernaturally large feet, with which they go stamping about and treading on other people's toes in all directions.
