I can scarcely tell where my thread tractive home, for us of simple lastes and of thought, unwinding, would have led me, ad not the stout voice of John, my elder brother, who was pedestrumizing behind the family coach, burst out with— "Father, you've left the saw, and the exe, and them two scythes:"

Father drew in the reins, looked tho'tful a moment, stood up on the tongue, and gazed back down the road, glanced at mother, and then said, with a sigh: "Well, I'm sorry; they's worth five dol-lars—an' money'll be scarce in the new country; but I—fcon't go back.

So we jogged along. Our turn-out was of the popular pattern, for which, fortunately, no patent has been taken. A broad roomy wagon on stout wheels, covered with white cloth stretched upon arched poles, and formed a canopy suggestive of the "milky way," filled with boxes of clothing, barrels of provisions, and divers cooking utensils, the whole drawn by a pair of stout though somewhat sergery farm-horses. scraggy farm-horses.

I will not attempt to give the panorama of our long, slow journey over so many hundred miles in such viciasitudes of weather, cooking our well-eaten meals in the open air, and sleeping within the half-shel-ter under storm as well as starlight. When night came father would drive out one side of the road, unbitch the horses, and then prepare for the cooking of supper. Mother was just as good a house wife there as in our anug kitchen at home. Every thing was as clean as it could be; the biscuits were white and feathery; and the tea-kettle swinging from the cross-stick on the crotches, sang the identical old song that it sung in "Illisoi." Father always gave thanks over these out-door meals; and I used to notice, or fancy I noticed, more softness in his rugged tones than before.

One night—we had been outmany weeks, had entered Minnesota, and were some for-ty miles west of the Falls of St. Anthony, in the broad belt of timber which reaches across that section of the country; John and Dave were out shooting pigeons, tea and biscuit were being served and esten with the usual relish—suddenly a man on horseback pulled up before us with the words: "For God's sake come and help us,
