In dreams, the mother heard its cry Of pain, perhaps of agony; She woke and clasped it to her breast. In hopes to full the babe to rest,

But still it howled.

"O! go to sleep," the father said, "Or else I'll break your little head."
The babe did ne'er a word reply, But dropped his fist into his eye, And then he howled.

"O! stop," the mother said; "that note Was never meant for such a throat." A tear stood in his bright blue eye, And persons living in the sky Could hear it howl.

"You'll have to leave the house, I swear! That horrid noise has turned my hair !" A fellow boarder called this out, But still the infant with a shout, Howled only worse.

At break of day, the infant still With right good hearty zeal and will, While kicking in its mother's arms, Filled boarders' souls with strange alarms By sundry howls.

A watchman, in the neighb'ring street, Plew faster on with nimble feet; He thought, perhaps, a robber bold Had killed a man, but he was sold By infant howls.

There in the twilight cold and gray, The parents whipped it as it lay, And soon the infant ceased its cries, And closing both its little eyes, Sank off to sleep.
