THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES. The President of the United States needs no vindication at the hands of the committee, and were it not on account of the partisan slanders with which he has been so unscrupulously assailed dur ing the late election, it might justly be deemed an offence against good taste to name him in this connection. His action, so far as it had any bearing upon the cir cumstances investigated by the committee, exhibited him in no other light than as a

Chief-Magistrate, actuated by a sincere desire to preserve the public peace, and uphold the law. Civil government was in successful operation in the city of New Orleans on the 30th of July, 1866. A disturbance arose to all which seriously threatened the good order of the city. Certain individuals were com plained of as disturbers of the peace, and Point Coupee, which interferes for a time engaged in an unlawful assemblage. Pro- with the action of the juries. Governor and Attorney-General of the State: "Is the military to interfere to prevent the civil process of the Court ?" He replied the same day : "The military will be expected to sustain, and not bstruct, or interfere with the proceedings of the courts," What else could a constitutional President of the nation say to the civil representatives of the State? Had General Baird asked the President for instructions, he would have re- voked the riot, and those who riotously ceived the same reply. Instead of this General Baird telegraphed to the Secreta-ry of War. The strict military course would have been for him to have telegraphed to the adjutant-General; He received no reply. Under all the pressure of the ocion, and with a day intervening, Gen eral Baird, for some reason, did not deem it worth his while to enquire whether the telegram had been received, or to repeat his request for instructions.

Of General Baird's telegram to the Secretary of War the President remained in gnorance until all was over. It is immeterial whether it might have turned out in the end that the court committed error in the end that the court committed error share in the become accessing to in issuing its process, as proposed.
