THE ROBBERY, AND THE CAPTURE OF THE THIEVES IN MILFORD TOWNSHIP.

On the evening of the 6th inst., a short time after the passage of the eastward bound passenger train commonly designated the "Cincinnati," two young men named respectively John Winn and John Fusselman, both sons of Juniata people, put in an appearance at Henry Given's saloon in Patterson.

On the morning of the 7th, when A. J. Hertzler, post master and store keeper at Locust Grove, went to open his place of business he found that his store had the night just passed been robbed, an entrance having been effected through the back door by means of the employment of false keys.

Mr. Hertzler came to Millin during the morning hours to consult with parties here as to ways and means to be employed in the arrest and detection of the thieves. Meanwhile the knowledge of his misfortune got abroad in the town.

On the morning of the 8th, Officer Wilson accompanied by Mr. Hertzler, went to the bridge near Hawk's mill, and found the goods that the thieves said had been left there, and thence to the ridge, where more goods had been concealed; but they failed to find the leg under which the articles taken from the store had been hid.

On Tuesday night, the 29th ult., George W. Suine's barn, situated near Shirlingsburg, was totally destroyed by fire. The fire was not discovered until eleven o'clock, and it was impossible to extinguish the flames or save anything.

On the morning of the 8th, Officer Wilson accompanied by Mr. Hertzler, went to the bridge near Hawk's mill, and found the goods that the thieves said had been left there, and thence to the ridge, where more goods had been concealed; but they failed to find the leg under which the articles taken from the store had been hid.

It was past noon, however, before Officer Samuel Wilson, of this borough, had all of the proper papers in his possession and was ready to start, with Mr. A. J. Hertzler, the robbed citizen, and assistants John Moser, of this borough, and Henry Given, of Patterson.

by a man named Calvin Harman, to search it.

On entering the house inquiry was made for Harman. Mrs. Harman stated that she and the children—three in number—were alone in the house; that Harman had gone out. Officer Wilson then stated his business, that it was to search the house.

After more conversation with Mrs. Harman, she told them to go upstairs. The stairway led up from the room in which they all were, which was entered directly by a door from the outside.

Wilson, with his assistant, Given, searched the upstairs, while Hertzler and Moser staid below; but nothing that they looked for was found. On returning to the first floor Officer Wilson proposed to enter a door to an adjoining room; it was locked. He asked why the door was locked, and was answered that the dead latch on the inside had fallen down.

He took hold of the door the second time and gave it a strong upward jerk, which sprung the latch out of the hasp, and it flew open. Instead of a lighted room, it seemed like a dungeon; the windows were closely curtained.

The officer strode in, intending to go uncurtain the windows that light might be obtained to search the room. He had scarcely advanced more than a step when his foot struck an object lying on the floor. By one of those quick not understood realizations, he knew that he had come in contact with a man lying on the floor, though he had not seen him.

He quickly stepped back into the room from which he had come and stated to his assistants that a man or men were in the adjoining room, and at the same time ordering them to come out. His order brought a response, which was in the nature of an inquiry as to "what was up?"

The officer told them that they would soon know what was up, and that they should come out immediately, which they did; and who should they be but the same John Winn and John Fusselman whom they were looking for.

It may be proper to add here that Officer Wilson and his assistants were properly armed, as was also Mr. Hertzler, and would have gone through a party of thieves a la Van Brant style, if resistance had been made to their arrest, or search for stolen goods.

The thrill of excitement incidental to the unexpected finding of the prisoners after the assurance that there was no one in the house being over, the curtains on the windows in the room were removed, and the search of that part of the house was begun.

There were two beds in the room, one on a bedstead and one on the floor. There was a bureau in one corner. To it the officer first directed his attention. A new shawl on top of it was the first article identified by Mr. Hertzler as his property.

A parcel of a particular kind of candy found in a drawer of the bureau was dealt out by Mr. Moser to Harman's children to keep them from crying, which they had commenced through the excitement that was for a moment occasioned by the finding of goods that belonged to Hertzler.

Goods were found in both the bed on the floor and the bed on the bedstead—goods that belonged to Hertzler and goods that did not belong to him. There was a considerable quantity of tobacco found in a cupboard in the first room that did not belong to Hertzler.

The unidentified goods are in the possession of Justice Kreider, where they will remain for the length of time required by law. While the search in the house was progressing Harman returned. He, too, was put under arrest, which at once brought out Winn and Fusselman in his defense.

They wanted to compromise for his release by telling where more goods were secreted. They stated that under a bridge near Hawk's mill a lot of goods belonging to Hertzler had been placed, and also on the ridge above Hawk's mill, under a log a parcel of goods had been hid.

But Officer Wilson didn't compromise. He told them that Harman must go along, and immediately prepared for leaving. He went to the residence of Mr. Leonard Groninger and stated the arrests he had made and what the search had revealed, and asked him to help to take the prisoners to Millin, which he promptly did by hitching a team to a sled, and loading on Winn and Fusselman and assistants Moser and Given's r guards, and his son to manage the horses, while Officer Wilson took Harman in his buggy, and Hertzler rode in the other buggy.

They brought the thieves to town between the hours of 9 and 10 o'clock P. M. of the 7th. They were immediately committed by Justice Kreider to jail.
