The Flow of Speech

Though we all employ speech, says the Popular Science Monthly, yet we differ in case and agreeableness of ut-terance. The voice is weak or powerful, as determined by the mode of action of our flock of breeding ewes upon it.'

is sharp, harsh, sweet or harmonious; this is determined by the conformation of the resonant cavities. Whatever quality of voice we happen to have naturally, is to be preserved, though it may be improved by constant attention to the car, by steady observation, finally by training. Speech does not flow from its source with the same case in all cases; here the mind is master, and, mental qualities differ from one another to a far greater extent than physical aptitudes. Some persons express themselves without difficulty or hesitationtheir thinking faculty acts as a continuons force; others seem to grasp a word or a phrase here and there-their thinking faculty is fluctuating, contused, undecided. A certain feeling of constraint produces stuttering and constituents. stammering. It used to be supposed
