A Nuisance-Pay Damages. An interesting suit at law was tried in Baltimore on Saturday, the leading points of which are as follows: In 1873 the Maryland Hospital for the Insane was established. At that time the plaintiff had a "fashionable and profitabie" summer boarding house adjacent to the building in which the hospital was established. He alleges that "in consequence of the howlings and profane language of the patients his boarders deserted him, his business was broken up and the value of his property depreciated," and he therefore sued for damages. In the course of the argu ment the court said that "neither the State upr a private corporation or individual had the right to so construct or conduct at asylum for the institution, as to prove a nuisance, without being liable for damages, and this liability existed whether the nuisance was it. caused by the original construction of the building or its subsequent use, which by other construction or use might have been avoided." The case has not yet been decided, but in view of the plain language of the court, quotseems to be only a question of time.
