BUNSET. Day is passing; softly, swiftly, Time rolls on toward the grave; While far over hills and mountains Sunbeams sink beneath the wares. But before their sure departure, They their mission do fulfill,

Brightening everything in nature, Hills and valleys, clouds and and rills. Setting for us an example, Thrilling every heart with joy, Bringing smiles and happy faces, And all clouds and griefs destroy. When the san has quite departed.

And his daily race is told, Sunbeams send up all their brightness, Just like little threads of gold. Causing clouds, so light and fleecy, Change to numerous beauteous hues, Waves of gold and silver, floating Far above us, while we muse

On the beauty, splendor, riches, Of the scences which they present, Watching how the vivid colors Blending now, or to earth have lent Half the charms that so entranced us,

Gilding every bush and tree, And the glittering, silver wavelets, As they dance upon the sea. But how quickly speeds the grandeur, All the brightness fades away, Purple, blue, and orange, violet,

> All have changed to leaden gray. While a purple tinge is stealing Faintly on the eastern sky, Fainter, paler, grows the stulight, As the closing hour draws nigh. Yet again we look out longing, To behold the beauty more,

But how rapid is the fading, Sunset now is almost o'er. Even while we gaze upon it, Clouds and shadows melt in one, Evening shades fall thick around us,

Indicate departing sun. As the light now softly fading. Seems to be departing far, Evening drops the curtain gently, Pins it with a twinkling star.
