"And what a shame, sir, when I'm a poor woman, and this is the only cloth I've got for company."

"It's a mean trick, madam, but I don't know as I can help you any. It has got so now, that they will cheat a dead man by palming off a stained coffin on him for wainut, and I expect to discover that mutton-chops are made of leather, and beef-steak of compressed saw dust. However, you have one con-calico dress for a poor woman on Thirteenth street, and I've no doubt they'll swindle me, and the goods will turn out half cotton. If they do, somebody will get hurt, and I know it."

"How Do you know it was brandy?" asked the lawyer. "I smelled of it first, and then I welcomed about a glassful of it." The unexpected verb wholly upset the gravity of the court, jury, and miscellaneous collection of people; and they were not assisted at all in recovering their equanimity by the further testimony that the man who bought the brandy drank of it himself "till he was quite salubrious."
